Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, I think the Department of Agriculture frequently condemns or requires the State authorities to condemn cattle where there is an outbreak of disease that might spread.

Mr. LEWIS. In such instances as that, where they threaten the whole country, I believe the Agricultural Department has agreed with the States to pay one-half. I am not sufficiently informed about the facts to enlighten my friend or consume my own time upon them.

Another circumstance in this connection, Mr. Chairman, is that the tuberculin test itself is very indeterminate. It supplies only a partial and only an occasional test of the fitness of the animal to supply desirable milk. I wish to have printed in connection with my remarks a lucid explanation of the tuberculin test. Now, I ask that the gentleman withdraw his point of order in the interest not only of the Maryland owner but the Virginia owner and prevent discrimination against suburbs of this city which are in everything except in a technical sense a part of the city itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by the insertion of the document he speaks of. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The extracts referred to are as follows:

IS THE TUBERCULIN TEST SAFE—DR. SMEAD IN REPLY TO DIRECT QUESTIONS FROM A PHYSICIAN TELLS WHAT HE BELIEVES.

C. D. SMEAD, Hector, N. Y.

SIR: I am an interested reader of the Tribune Farmer, and especially of what you write in relation to the feeding and care of animals. Now, I hope you will take no offense when I ask you why it is that you sometimes advise the farmer to have a cow tested with tuberculin and at other times you will answer by saying keep tuberculin out of them. In other words, if you consider tuberculin an infallible test in one case, why is it not in each and every case, and why should it not be used on all cows furnishing milk for the city market? (2) Why should not city health boards have the perfect right to demand that all cows furnishing milk for their city be tuberculin tested? Now, Doctor, I am writing this for information purely and not putting them to you as catch questions. As a practicing physician I am interested in the maintenance of the health of the human race.

B. ALLEN TRACY, M. D.

MANCHESTER, MICH., November 22, 1911.

No offense whatever, Doctor; I am always ready and willing to make explanations for the benefit of those who read my writings. I will say, first: No, sir; I do not consider tuberculin an infallible test for tuberculosis in cattle, and I think there are very few having large experience in its use who do. It is true some veterinarians have loudly advocated its general use, and Federal, State and local boards of health have advised its general use, both as an economic matter for cattle owners and a safeguard for city consumers of milk and other dairy products. Now, to you, doctor, and others who read this, I desire to say a few things regarding tuberculin. When that renowned bacteriologist, Dr. Robert Koch, of Germany, discovered the true cause of tuberculosis in 1883 and in 1886 succeeded in making a culture that he named tuberculin, he believed that he had succeeded in finding a culture that would cure all incipient cases of human tuberculosis. He had no thought of using the culture he named tuberculin as a diagnostic agent; but when tuberculin was injected into the system of people whom it was thought might possibly have incipient tuberculosis, it was soon found that instead of a cure in about 7 out of 8 cases it caused latent germs of tuberculosis to develop rapidly, while in the eighth case it seemed to arrest further progress of the disease. It was also found that people who possibly would have lived many years, or even the three score years and ten, went to early graves.

Now, tuberculin testing in a general way was always fraught with serious loss to the owners of cattle. Conditions were generally ignored regarding its use. No attention was paid to normal or abnormal conditions of the animals when the tuberculin was injected. Hence it condemned many healthy animals, while it failed to cause a reaction in cases that were really dangerous in the herd. I advise its use in a case where there are symptoms of tuberculous disease as an assistant to the veterinarian in diagnosing the case. Thus it is that when a farmer writes me giving the symptoms as manifested by his cow I advise him to have the cow or cows tested with tuberculin by a competent veterinarian who knows cows and cow nature. If the cow is in her normal condition and is not suffering from any excitement, if she has not been shipped on the cars or driven miles on the road and is not near the period of heat or within six weeks of calving, either before or after, then tuberculin is a wonderful aid to such a veterinarian in correctly determining whether the cow is tuberculous or not.

I advise keeping tuberculin out of all cows that are apparently healthy, for the reason that tuberculin acts on the latent germs of tuberculosis in cows precisely as it does on those in the human. It does in some cases so excite latent germs into activity that in a few weeks the animal has active tuberculous disease, just as it proved to do when Dr. Koch used it as a cure for incipient tuberculous disease in the human. This fact explains why it is that sometimes when a buyer purchases cows from a herd in which no animal had died with tuberculosis and buys them under the tuberculin test, there is no reaction to the test, yet in a few weeks some of the tested animals become actively tuberculous. This is not, as has been thought, due to infection afterwards; it is due to the effect of the tuberculin on the latent germs already present that in all probability never would have caused any harm to the animal. Thus I say it is putting the owners of cows in jeopardy to demand that every cow in the herd furnishing milk for city consumption be tested with tuberculin.

This enforced test does not insure any purer or better milk for the consumer. In fact, in many cases I personally know of it furnishes the consumer milk from cows that are really tuberculous. This is due to the fact that tuberculin many times fails to cause a reaction when cows are well advanced with tuberculous disease. Every veterinarian of large experience recognizes this fact, and Dr. James Lean and other renowned authorities have so repeatedly declared. I refer you to Volume IV, page 465, of Lean's Veterinary Medicine. Again, it is a known fact that cows frequently tested with tuberculin become immune to the effects of it. Thus it is where city health boards demand frequent tests a really tuberculous cow will fail to react. As you, Doctor, and others are seeking information regarding this matter, I will give you an everyday illustration of what the veterinary inspector finds who goes forth honestly to inspect a farmer's herd. He finds animals in all stages of pregnancy and of various ages. Some cows may be near calving; others only recently pregnant; some, perhaps, that have aborted; some nervous and some of a mild temperament; some confined in a warm barn; some out in the pasture. He orders up the pastured cows and begins business. His orders are to test the whole herd that are furnishing milk for —. He takes, if honest, not less than three temperatures, morning, noon, and night, at about six hours apart. This is his base to work from. He then injects the tuberculin, waits 8 or 12 hours, and begins to take temperatures every two hours for a period of 12 or 16 hours. In case some one or more of them show a rise of temperature of 2½ degrees, and it remains there for 4, 6, or 8 hours, under all rules of testing this cow will be condemned. But he finds some cows that show a rise of temperature of 1 degree, or 1½ degrees, or possibly 2 degrees, above his initial temperature. He can't condemn these cows; he passes them as sound. Six weeks or three months later he retests them, when, perhaps, they don't react at all. They may have been sound when the first test was made and reacted under conditions unknown to the inspector, or these same cows may be so advanced in tuberculous disease as not to react to tuberculin; yet the inspector, under the edict of the health board, can not do otherwise than pass them as sound; or if the cows are retested at the request of the owner a few times they may become immune to the tuberculin.

Now, in conclusion, I desire to say I have great faith in the use of tuberculin as an aid in diagnosing a suspicious case, and so advise its use; but, used indiscriminately, irrespective of conditions, I consider it as much of a menace to the cattle owners and consumers of milk as is bovine tuberculosis itself, and I believe city health boards should modify their rules so as to demand that tuberculin be used only as an accessory in diagnosing cases suspicious to the eyes of the inspector. While I personally have faith in tuberculin and advise it, after years of experience with it, I buy no cattle that have been tested with tuberculin for at least six months after the test was made.

G. B., of Waterville, Me., and G. T., of Rutland, Vt., please accept the answer to Dr. Tracy as an answer to your questions.—C. D. Smead, V. S.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

Order of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for the suppression and prevention of tuberculosis in cattle.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE,

COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,

Washington, November 26, 1909.

Ordered: The Commissioners of the District of Columbia having learned that tuberculosis, a communicable disease, prevails among the cattle in the District of Columbia and adjacent States, do hereby, pursuant to law, authorize and direct the following measures for the prompt suppression and to prevent the spread of bovine tuberculosis within the District of Columbia and to adjoining States:

SECTION 1. It is hereby ordered that no cattle shall, in any manner, be removed from the District of Columbia except upon written permission from the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry or the health officer of the District of Columbia, which removal shall only be granted for cattle which have successfully passed an official tuberculin test, or are for immediate slaughter at an establishment at which United States meat inspection is maintained.

SEC. 2. Any person, firm, or corporation desiring to bring any cattle into the District of Columbia, except as provided in section 3, paragraph (c), shall first make application and obtain a permit from the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry or from the health officer of the District of Columbia. The said application shall be in writing, stating the number, sex, and the age of the cattle, whether over or under 6 months old, the exact place, date, and time at which it is desired to enter said cattle, and their destination within the District of Columbia, together with a declaration showing clearly the purpose for which the cattle are desired to be entered, whether for immediate slaughter, feeding or breeding purposes, or for milk production.

SEC. 3. (a) Cattle offered for entry into the District of Columbia must be accompanied by a permit, as provided in section 2, and must be identified by an official veterinarian of the Bureau of Animal Industry or of the health department of the District of Columbia, and must be appropriately tagged before entrance is permitted, except as provided in paragraph (c) of this section.

(b) Cattle over 6 months old, for purposes other than immediate slaughter, unless accompanied by a satisfactory certificate of tuberculin test by a veterinary inspector of the Bureau of Animal Industry or an official veterinarian of the health department of the District of Columbia or of the State from which brought, must be immediately taken, after identification, as provided in paragraph (a) of this section, to a place designated by the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry or health officer of the District of Columbia, and there quarantined apart from all other cattle until officially tuberculin tested and disposed of in accordance with these regulations: Provided, That no indemnity shall be allowed for such cattle as shall be slaughtered on account of their being deemed to be tuberculous. When accompanied by certificate of tuberculin test, as herein provided, the said certificate must show the place and the date, within 30 days, of being offered for entry, of inspection and tuberculin testing, also temperature chart, description of the animal or animals, age, markings, and tag numbers, if tagged.

(c) Cattle for immediate slaughter may enter the District of Columbia if tagged in accordance with paragraph (a) and without the tuberculin test, on condition that the tag therein provided for shall remain attached to the hide until removed in the presence of an employee of the Bureau of Animal Industry or of the health department of the District of Columbia, to either of whom it shall be delivered. The owner of the animal at the time of slaughter is hereby required to notify the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry or the health officer of the District of Columbia, stating the place where the hides will be found. If shipped in cars and consigned direct to an establishment having United States meat inspection, cattle for immediate slaughter may enter the District of Columbia without complying with section 2 and section 3, paragraph (a): Provided, however, That the consignee shall keep a complete record of each animal received, date of receipt, its place of origin, railroads traversed, name of shipper, and butcher class to which each animal belongs, and shall report the same before the slaughter of any such animals to the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry through the veterinary inspector stationed at that establishment.

(d) Cattle under 6 months old for purposes other than immediate slaughter, when not accompanied by certificates as indicated in paragraph (b), may be brought into the District of Columbia as provided in paragraph (a), but said cattle must be accompanied by affidavits by the breeder or feeder and by the owner or shipper, said affidavits to state that tuberculosis has not been known to exist on the premises, during the six months immediately preceding the offer for entry, upon which said animals have been kept.

SEC. 4. Cattle over 6 months old already within the District of Columbia shall be inspected and tuberculin tested by a veterinary inspector of the Bureau of Animal Industry or of the health department of the District of Columbia. Cattle under 6 months old shall, in the same manner, be inspected, and when deemed necessary shall be tuberculin tested, said inspection and tuberculin testing to be repeated annually or at such times as the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry or the health officer of the District of Columbia may direct. All such cattle shall be officially tagged "U. S. B. A. I.," with a serial number, or "U. S. B. A. I. Reacted," with a serial number.

SEC. 5. All cattle already within the District of Columbia which are deemed to be tuberculous, either as a result of physical examination or the tuberculin test, shall be slaughtered within a time and at a place designated by the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry or the health officer of the District of Columbia, and shall be subject to official post-mortem inspection, and the carcass of any such animal shall be disposed of according to the meat-inspection regulations of the Bureau of Animal Industry. All such cattle shall be appraised before being slaughtered, the owners to be indemnified as hereinafter provided from any available appropriation made by Congress for the Bureau of Animal Industry of the United States Department of Agriculture for carrying out the provisions of the act of May 29, 1884, except as specified in section 8 of these regulations: Provided, That no liability shall be incurred under these regulations by the United States Department of Agriculture in excess of the funds available from the aforesaid appropriation of Congress, and whenever the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry shall deem it necessary or advisable, because of the lack of funds for the aforesaid purpose, he shall notify the health officer of the District of Columbia to that effect, and thereafter no liabilities shall accrue against the United States on account of any act done or permitted under these regulations.

SEC. 6. (a) The health officer of the District of Columbia shall designate or request the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry to designate an appraiser, who shall appraise each animal within five days prior to the date of slaughter, basing the amount upon the class and market value of the animal at the time of the appraisal, whether for breeding purposes or for meat or milk production. Animals reacting to the tuberculin test but not exhibiting any physical evidence of tuberculosis shall be appraised without considering the presence of a diseased condition, but animals exhibiting any physical evidence of tuberculosis shall be appraised as diseased animals. The amount of appraisal shall not in any case exceed the sum of $75 for a pure-bred and registered animal, or the sum of $50 for a grade or nonregistered animal. If the amount of appraisal of any animal, as determined by the appraiser designated, is not satisfactory to the owner or owners of such animal, a written notice of such fact, setting forth the reasons for complaint, shall be forwarded upon the day of appraisal to the health officer of the District of Columbia. The amount of the appraisal shall then be determined by arbitrators, one to be appointed by the health officer of the District of Columbia or the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry and one by the owner or owners of the animal or animals. If the said arbitrators are not able to agree as to the amount of appraisal, a third arbitrator shall be appointed by them, whose decision shall be final. Arbitrators shall be paid at a rate of compensation not to exceed $5 per diem and necessary expenses. Compensation for the arbitrator appointed by the owner, and the third arbitrator, if appointed, shall be paid from the fund of the United States Department of Agriculture if the decision made is against the arbitrator appointed by the health officer or the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, but if the decision is in favor of such arbitrator the owner shall pay the compensation of the arbitrator appointed by him, and the third arbitrator, if appointed.

(b) Following the appraisal of animals, in accordance with paragraph (a) of this section, the amount of reimbursement shall be determined by the results of post-mortem inspection according to the following rules:

Rule 1. If any animal is found, upon post-mortem inspection, not to be affected with tuberculosis, the carcass and other edible portions shall be passed for food, and the owner shall sell the same, including all accompanying parts, for a reasonable price, which price shall be deducted from the amount of appraisal, and the balance, if any, thus remaining, shall be paid from any fund available for that purpose.

Rule 2. If any animal is found, upon post-mortem inspection, to be affected with tuberculosis, and the lesions are such that the carcass and parts of the carcass are passed for food, the owner shall sell the same, including all accompanying parts, for a reasonable price, which price shall be deducted from 80 per cent of the amount of the appraisal, and the balance, if any, thus remaining shall be paid from any fund available for that purpose.

Rule 3. If any animal, upon post-mortem inspection, is condemned for offal, the owner shall sell the hide for a reasonable price, which price shall be deducted from 40 per cent of the amount of the appraisal, and the balance, if any, thus remaining shall be paid from any fund available for that purpose.

Sec. 7. Any premises upon which there have been kept animals affected with tuberculosis shall be disinfected promptly after the removal of such animals, and in a manner satisfactory to the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry or the health officer of the District of Columbia, said disinfection to be at the expense of the owner or owners of the premises or of the owner of the animals.

Sec. 8. Any owner, shipper, or common carrier bringing any cattle into the District of Columbia in violation of these regulations will be liable to prosecution, and the cattle shall be immediately removed, at the owner's expense, from the District of Columbia. Such cattle, however, may remain in the District of Columbia if inspected and tuberculin tested under the following conditions: The owner or owners shall first sign an agreement providing for the inspection and tuberculin test by a veterinary inspector of the Bureau of Animal Industry or of the Health Department of the District of Columbia, and if any one or more of the said animals should then be deemed tuberculous, that he or they will cause such animals to be slaughtered in accordance with the specifications of section 5 of these regulations; and, further, that no claim for reimbursement for any loss which might be thus sustained will ever be made against the United States Department of Agriculture, or any other branch of the United States Government, or the District of Columbia, or any officer or department thereof.

Sec. 9. Any person violating any of these regulations, or entering cattle by fraudulent means, or using false or fraudulent tags, or interfering in any way with the work of any official, or using any false or fraudulent means to enable any cattle to pass the tuberculin test, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $40 nor less than $5.

The foregoing regulations shall go into effect upon their approval by the Secretary of Agriculture.

HENRY B. F. MACFARLAND,
HENRY L. WEST,
WILLIAM V. JUDSON,

Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Approved, November 27, 1909.

JAMES WILSON,
Secretary of Agriculture.

NOTE.—The States of Maryland and Virginia require tuberculin test for dairy and neat cattle entering from other States.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. TURNBULL. I would like to have the amendment again reported.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, if this matter is of such vital moment and so far-reaching, as I infer from the statement of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS], it is singular to me that he did not come before the committee, where we could have carefully considered this in all its bearings, and in view of that fact I think I will have to insist on the point of order.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the gentleman yield before he does that? I want to say we did present this to the chairman of the committee, and this thing is pertinent at this point because it is this very fund out of which the District dairy cow is now made the subject of compensation—

Mr. LAMB. Did I understand the gentleman appeared before the committee?

Mr. LEWIS. Not technically before the committee, but the chairman is not uninformed of the situation as far as I am concerned.

Mr. LAMB. I will say right there, Mr. Chairman, when my colleague mentioned the fact to me a few days ago, I suggested that he confer with Dr. Melvin and get his views on this question, and of course he had the right to offer an amendment here; and in view of the far-reaching results and importance of this thing, and the fact that we have not had an opportunity to discuss it, I will have to insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LEWIS. The point of order has not been discussed.

The CHAIRMAN. It appears rather plain to the Chair that this is new legislation.

Mr. LEWIS. It simply defines this clause, and the whole subject matter deals with the identical topic, and it simply defines and improves the definition.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, if it is necessary for me to say anything, I will suggest that this is brand new legislation, and, of course, it is subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. It so appears to the Chair, and the point of order is sustained, and the Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. PEPPER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 232) extending the operation of the act for the control and regulation of the waters of Niagara River, for the preservation of Niagara Falls, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BURTON, Mr. ROOT, and Mr. BACON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following concurrent resolution (No. 32):

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 20,000 additional copies of House Document No. 342, being the message of the President of the United States transmitting a report of the Tariff Board on Schedule K of the tariff law—12,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives and 8,000 copies for the use of the Senate.

AGRICULTURE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For all necessary expenses for investigations and experiments in dairy industry, cooperative investigations of the dairy industry in the various States, inspection of renovated butter, factories, and markets, $177,900: Provided, That the sanitary provisions for slaughtering, meat canning, or similar establishments, as set forth in the act of June 30, 1906 (34 Stat., p. 676), are hereby extended to cover renovated butter factories as defined in the act of May 9, 1902 (32 Stat., p. 196), under such regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe.

Mr. MANN and Mr. CLARK of Florida rose.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That is what I wanted to do.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, this matter was carefully gone over by the committee, and I submit the following: There are some 50 renovated-butter factories in the United States, and while the department is authorized to inspect their products it has no authority to destroy the butter that is made up into the finished product, nor has the department the authority to compel sanitary conditions in such factories. Such opportunity is sought by the amendment of the law requested. We asked Dr. Melvin particularly on that point, and here is what he said:

The CHAIRMAN. The next paragraph asks for an increase of $27,900, "For all necessary expenses for investigations and experiments in dairy industry," etc.; and there is a provision there that contains some new language, Doctor, that would evidently go out on a point of order.

Dr. MELVIN. Under this clause of the appropriation act we have been conducting an inspection of these renovated-butter factories, which has been provided for specifically, and we find that we are somewhat lacking in authority to enforce that as completely as we would like. We think we ought to have additional legislation so as to give us authority to require these men to conduct these places in a clean and sanitary way, or withdraw the inspection, the same as we would in the case of a meat-packing house.

We interrogated other men who were before us on this point and came to the conclusion that notwithstanding the fact that this new language was subject to the point of order, that it was so necessary we would submit it to the House in confidence that it was good legislation and ought to be adopted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it may be that these butter-renovating establishments ought to be inspected as the slaughter and meat-canning establishments are now. I do not know. The Committee on Agriculture has a right to bring a bill in on that subject where it can receive proper consideration. I can easily imagine that you can go from one step to another, and if you can give this department or bureau this authority over butter-renovating establishments, why not over creamery establishments, why not over dairies? What is the distinction that is to be drawn? It is only one step each time. Now, the question of the desirability of having inspectors look after the dairies of the country with the similar powers you have in reference to slaughtering establishments certainly ought not to be done without full consideration of the fact, and I feel that I ought to make the point of order on the proviso.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will yield, permit me to say that under the law, as he very well knows, we are now inspecting renovated-butter factories, but the point was made to the committee, by the gentleman representing the Bureau of Animal Industry, that the authority given under the present law, permitting inspection of these factories, was not sufficient to allow them to condemn this bad butter. There might be a case where a portion of the product was bad. They have no power under the law, as I understand it, to condemn that portion and withdraw it from interstate shipment at all.

Mr. MANN. They have the power under the pure-food law to prevent its going into interstate shipment at all.

Mr. LEVER. Let me read the statement of Mr. Rawl, who is division chief of the Dairy Division of the Bureau of Animal Industry and in charge of this work.

Mr. MANN. He probably is not informed as to the law.

Mr. LEVER. He is making the statement of the solicitor of the department, and that is why I want to read it. It is as follows:

Mr. RAWL. The solicitor has ruled that we did not have the authority to condemn the raw material; that we could simply follow it up and see it go into interstate commerce, and when it was offered for sale we could confiscate it. But if 500 pounds of rotten packing stock is in a factory, maybe there is 10,000 pounds of other packing stock there; and you can understand how impossible it is for us to follow through that packing stock so as to be able to identify it when it comes out of the factory and is offered for sale.

It seemed to the committee that to make the provision of the meat-inspection law apply to this matter would give to the Department of Agriculture considerable more authority and bring about a much less cumbersome system of dealing with this proposition.

Mr. MANN. Now, as to putrid butter, it is covered by the pure-food law, as far as interstate commerce is concerned. The gentleman would have it apply to the manufacture of renovated butter. How about canned goods? There is any quantity of rotten canned goods on the shelves of merchants in this country. Some of them are rotten when they are put up. They come under the provisions of the pure-food law when they go into interstate commerce. Some think that we ought to put an inspector at each one of the canning establishments in the country, the same as we do at the slaughter houses. Some think that we ought to put an inspector in every kind of business. A few years ago the people who manufactured explosives, of their own volition, insisted on the passing of a law which would require an inspector to inspect the explosives at the time they were manufactured—of course, at Government expense. Where are you going to stop when you enter on a plan providing inspectors for every class of goods, which, when going into interstate commerce, may be condemned or which may be bad?

Mr. LEVER. Does not the gentleman think the judgment of Congress in such cases would be fairly good to follow?

Mr. MANN. I think the judgment of Congress usually is that it can not make a distinction, and hold to it, between two things that are almost exactly alike, and when you provide that one shall be subject to onerous burdens or receive benefits, you must provide that the other does. And it is only a step longer until you have the whole business of the country, or might have, controlled by inspectors appointed by the National Government. I am not in favor of that. I do not know whether I would be in favor of the proposition to have the renovated butter controlled in the same way that meat slaughtering is or not. We have no information before us sufficient to enable us to pass upon that question. I dare say there is no one here who can tell what the sanitary provisions for slaughtering of meat, canning, or similar industries are under the existing law, without referring to a printed book. And I dare say that when gentlemen refer to the printed book, that no two gentlemen in the House will agree upon just what the sanitary provisions are.

Mr. LAMB. I ask for a ruling, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order against the proviso, Mr. Chairman, in the paragraph ending with line 23, page 13, on the ground that it is a change of law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question for the Chair is not the desirability for the legislation, but whether it is proper in this bill. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

For all necessary expenses for scientific investigations in diseases of animals, including the maintenance and improvement of the bureau experiment station at Bethesda, Md., and the necessary alterations of buildings thereon, and the necessary expenses for investigations of tuberculin, serums, antitoxins, and analogous products, $76,680.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to get some information, Mr. Chairman. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee why it is that in this case of the maintenance and improvement of the bureau experiment station at Bethesda, Md., the matter was not submitted to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds? And what estimate has this committee had as to these buildings and these improvements upon buildings?

Mr. LAMB. This appropriation has been carried for years, Mr. Chairman, and time and again the members of the Committee on Agriculture have been out there and inspected that place. The bureau carries on scientific investigations there.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am not speaking of the investigations. I am speaking of the alterations and additions to the buildings.

Mr. LAMB. Those are absolutely necessary in order to carry on the work properly.

Mr. MANN. It has been included for years in the bill.

Mr. LAMB. Yes. I would like the gentleman from Florida to go out with me some day and look at that station himself. We have inspected it from top to bottom.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Can the chairman of the committee give me any information as to what portion of the $80,000 is to be used for the alteration of buildings?

Mr. LAMB. Last year it was $5,038.74.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For construction of buildings at bureau experiment station at Bethesda, Md., and bureau experiment farm at Beltsville, Md., $16,500.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order against that paragraph. I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question. Was this matter referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds?

Mr. LAMB. No; I think not.

Mr. CULLOP. I have noticed that there has been a great deal of particularity in the House about one committee infringing upon the prerogatives and rights of some other committee. Does not this item belong to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds?

Mr. LAMB. I think not. This farm out here in Maryland is used for an experiment station and for dairy experiment work. There is a large establishment out there.

Mr. CULLOP. Yes. I noticed, though, last year that when we came to build a new building for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, instead of it going to the Committee on Printing it went to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Why should this not go there, too?

Mr. LAMB. Because this work keeps on continuously. This is a very large farm.

Mr. CULLOP. Oh, all the work keeps on; it is not going to stop. Did the committee have any estimates as to the cost of these buildings?

Mr. LAMB. No; because this work is done under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture. He has his men out there who carry on this work. We bought this farm for experimental purposes, to teach these people and give them object lessons in farming, and we are carrying out just what the gentleman from Indiana has been preaching about so eloquently here this morning.

Mr. CULLOP. Yes. I thank the gentleman for the compliment; but that does not in any way obviate the difficulty that I speak of. Before appropriations are made for buildings, does not the gentleman think it would be wise if some estimates were furnished and some knowledge obtained as to the kind of buildings to be constructed, and the cost of the same?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. LEVER. Let me say to the gentleman from Indiana that the very thing he speaks of is, in my judgment, answered by the amount of the appropriation contained in the bill itself. The limit of the cost of these buildings at Bethesda and at Beltsville, Md., is $16,500. That is the estimate which the Department of Agriculture puts upon them. They thought these improvements to the buildings should cost only $16,500, exactly as the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department reports to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds that he believes it will cost so much to build a courthouse or post office in the district of the gentleman from Indiana. This is the estimate that the gentleman from Indiana is asking about.

Mr. CULLOP. Then, using the very illustration that the gentleman has made, why would it not be the duty of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to make appropriations for the buildings, instead of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds?

Mr. LEVER. I shall be very glad to answer the gentleman as far as I am able to do it. The work at Beltsville and Bethesda is in a measure scientific and in a measure demonstration work. These buildings are necessary as a part of the experiments going on—experiments in tuberculous cattle, experiments in hog cholera, experiments in the testing of various serums, and things of that kind. These buildings are a part of the work of the Department of Agriculture, and they have been carried in this bill from year to year ever since I have been on the committee.

Mr. CULLOP. That is exactly the evil we are trying to cure. We all contend that the practice was a bad one, and for that reason we are undertaking to remedy the evil that has heretofore existed. When this policy is pursued it almosts puts the head of the department in the attitude of owner, and we are merely the instruments to appropriate the money and carry out his ideas of extending buildings, making improvements, and things of that kind. Now, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] was unhappy in his illustration, because if that was carried out in theory and practice in this House—

Mr. LEVER. "The gentleman from South Carolina" will say that he is unhappy right now.

Mr. CULLOP. I imagine so, as he considers this matter. If that was carried out, then the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads would build all the extensions of post-office buildings in the country instead of that matter being considered and reported upon by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I know that my friend would like to have a more direct answer to his question, and we are prepared to give it. In the hearings before the committee I asked this question.

Then follows this detailed information. We put it in the printed hearings so that the gentleman from Indiana and others could see it. It is too long to read here, but here is a statement of the entire expenses of these farms. Here is the bill of particulars, as you lawyers would say, and here is a triumphant vindication of our careful preparation of this bill and a complete answer to the gentleman's question.

I will insert in the Record the reply of Dr. Melvin to my inquiries:

The CHAIRMAN. I will ask you, Doctor, under that head to give, first, the date of acquisition of the experimental farms at Bethesda, Md.; Arlington, Va.; and Beltsville, Md.; the original acreage of each; the acreage of subsequent additions, if any; the dates of acquisition of said additions; the initial cost of original acreage of each; the cost of subsequent additions; and detailed accounts of the annual expenditures at each of these farms. That is what we want to get at and that is the reason I made that inquiry. I will furnish you with a copy of the letter I wrote to the Secretary.

Dr. MELVIN. I should like to have it. Then we can get it at once. The work at the Beltsville farm consists of investigations and experiments in the breeding and feeding of live stock and poultry and in dairying. The work at Bethesda consists of the investigation of contagious diseases of animals. The Arlington farm comes under the Bureau of Plant Industry—not Animal Industry. The information which was prepared and furnished in response to the chairman's letter is here inserted, as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY,
Washington, D. C., December 29, 1911.

The experiment farm of this bureau at Bethesda, Md., was acquired July 5, 1899. The farm at Beltsville, Md., was acquired June 30, 1910. The original acreage of the farm at Bethesda, Md., was 20 acres. The original acreage of the farm at Beltsville, Md., was 475 acres.

The only subsequent addition to the Bethesda (Md.) farm consists of a tract of 30 acres, purchased August 11, 1902. No addition has been made to the Beltsville (Md.) farm.

The initial cost of the 20 acres at Bethesda, Md., was $20,000. The initial cost of the Beltsville (Md.) farm was $25,000.

The cost of the subsequent addition of 30 acres to the Bethesda (Md.) farm was $10,000.

Appended herewith are two statements showing detailed annual expenditures at the two farms. These detailed expenditures have been arranged under two headings, namely, (1) construction, equipment, and improvements, and (2) operating expenses. Operating expenses have been subdivided under the headings of (1) maintenance and (2) operation.

In explanation of the expenses at the Bethesda (Md.) farm for 1898 and 1899, it should be stated that the experiment station was moved to this point in 1897 and land leased, with the option of purchase, necessitating certain expenditures for equipment and for operating expenses.

Very respectfully,

A. D. MELVIN, Chief of Bureau.

P. S.—Appended also is copy of a statement from the Bureau of Plant Industry with reference to the farm at Arlington.

Mr. CULLOP. I am very glad that it is satisfactory to the chairman of the committee; but I still have been unable so far to get the information I asked for. Now I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the fact that last year's appropriation bill carried this provision:

For all necessary expenses for continuing the equipment of the experimental farm at Beltsville, Md., including the necessary alterations of buildings thereon, the construction and repair of fences, roadways, drains, and other incidental work, and for the maintenance of the farm, including salaries of assistants and labor, feed for animals, light, and power, $10,000.

This item shows that last year they had this $10,000 for the purpose of building. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think that with $16,000 a year, the amount appropriated in this bill, they must be getting some immense buildings out there on that farm, and plenty of them?

Mr. CULLOP. For a farm, I should say they were. I have not understood farmers go into the building business quite as extensively as here proposed, as a rule, on a farm of that size. They usually have a larger acreage.

Mr. LAMB. There are 400 or 500 acres on one of these farms.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Is there any room left for farming after they have the buildings on it?

Mr. LAMB. It is an elegant place. There are 30 or 40 acres in splendid oak timber that in a few years I believe will be worth as much as the whole farm cost the Government.

Mr. CULLOP. I am happy to learn that there is some hope of profit in that direction.

Mr. LAMB. I have been a farmer myself, and I know what a farm will do. I said to the manager of that farm, "I can go on this farm and make $4,000 or $5,000 a year profit, and I hope you gentlemen are going to make something out of this farm in addition to your experimental work and your object lessons in teaching the people how to farm."

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Let me ask the gentleman this question for information: Does the gentleman think a farmer on a stock farm or other well-managed farm is spending $16,000 a year for buildings? Is not that an unusual thing?

Mr. LAMB. They do not cost that much.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. You propose to appropriate $16,500 this year for buildings.

Mr. LAMB. That runs the farm, and covers all the other work.

Mr. CULLOP. There is $16,000 for construction.

Mr. LAMB. That covers Beltsville and Bethesda, both.

Mr. CULLOP. That is simply for building, not for maintenance. It says "for the construction of buildings at Bureau Experiment Station at Bethesda, Md., and Bureau Experiment Farm at Beltsville, Md., $16,500."

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman let me call his attention to this fact, that wherever you have an epidemic of foot-and-mouth disease, for instance, and you have a cow on the Bethesda farm afflicted with that disease, it is necessary for the purpose of handling her to prepare and erect a brand new building. Not only that, but as soon as the cow is taken from the house it is necessary to burn or fumigate the house or tear it down so that the disease shall not be communicated to the community. That is true of hog cholera, tuberculosis, and other diseases, and it is necessary for buildings to be altered almost every day in order that the public may be protected against these diseases.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Indiana that he is supposed to have reserved a point of order on this paragraph. To whom does the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. CULLOP. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I want to ask the gentleman from South Carolina if it is a fact that in hospitals where contagious diseases are treated it is necessary—for instance, in a smallpox hospital—when you get through and there are no more patients, to burn down the hospital?

Mr. LEVER. I do not think it is quite fair to compare the human race and their treatment with that of animals.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. No; but that is not the practice with human beings. If you have to have a new building for the treatment of hog cholera, do you mean to say that you must treat the hogs better than you do individuals?

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman can make the distinction between the treatment of a human patient and a hog patient; there are a hundred reasons for the difference in the treatment, which I do not propose to detail here, but they will occur to the gentleman from Illinois, who is a practical man.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Yes; but where the Government is treating these diseases, it seems to me it is unnecessary to burn the building down and put up a new one each time the animal comes in with one of these diseases.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman overlooks the fact that a hospital for human beings is well constructed out of good lumber, good brick, or stone, while these buildings are ordinary shacks, a different kind of structure entirely; they are temporary and must be moved about from place to place, as necessity and caution dictate.

Mr. CULLOP. Does the gentleman from South Carolina mean to be understood as saying that this department, with all the support it has had from the Government, has not been able yet to discover some method by which it can fumigate a building and eradicate it from disease?

Mr. LEVER. Oh, I do not think that that heroic method of destroying the building would be necessary for every animal that suffered there. I presume the Government does not destroy the building unless it is wise to do so as a matter of extreme caution. I did not make any such statement. In every bad disease, perhaps in the foot-and-mouth disease, which is very dangerous and very destructive, the property very likely might be burned down, and they would be justified as a matter of protection and caution. But in the case of hog cholera or tuberculosis they would not do it in all probability. You must depend upon the discretion of the experts in such matters.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman made a natural inquiry as to the jurisdiction of the committee.

Mr. CULLOP. Yes; that is my point of order.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest that the Public Buildings and Grounds Committee has never exercised jurisdiction over the construction of any building except those which are constructed under the Treasury Department under the supervision of the Supervising Architect; as, for instance, the Agricultural Department constructs the Weather Bureau building and the Agricultural Committee has jurisdiction. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has jurisdiction over the lighthouse buildings, life-saving buildings, and all such buildings constructed by the Government not constructed under the Supervising Architect, although they used to be constructed by the Treasury Department. The Committee on Military Affairs has jurisdiction over the construction of barracks and quarters for the Army, including the residences of officers which are constructed under the War Department and not under the Supervising Architect. That rule runs all through the Government service and applies, under the rules of the House, in the reference of bills relating to this subject.

Mr. CULLOP. Does not the gentleman think it would be a better policy to be pursued by Congress in the erection of all public buildings that they should be erected under the supervision of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, so that there would be a unified policy instead of the distributive policy that we are now pursuing? Do not the rules of the House in prescribing the duties of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds send a matter of this kind to its jurisdiction?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, in the question of jurisdiction I think the gentleman is wrong both as to the rule and certainly as to the practice.

The rules often conflict. All matters relating to agriculture go to the Committee on Agriculture; all matters relating to buildings and grounds go to the Committee on Buildings and Grounds. Here is a building that pertains to agriculture. To which committee does it go. The rules do not determine that because it might be referred to either committee, but the practice of the House in construing those rules has always been to send these bills or matters relating to the construction of small buildings—incidental buildings—in different departments to committees having jurisdiction of those departments. The agricultural building, which is in Washington, would not come through the Committee on Agriculture. It is not an incident to agriculture. It is the construction of a building for office purposes. But a life-saving station that costs a few hundred dollars or an oil storage house for the Lighthouse Service which costs four or five hundred dollars, why it would seem that it ought to be constructed by the Lighthouse Service or constructed by the Life-Saving Service, and propositions to construct them have always been referred to the committee that has jurisdiction over such service.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire, unless the Chair desires to hear a word from me, if the gentleman will yield to me, to speak on the point of order. I understand it is a point of order to lines 8 to 11, on page 14.

Mr. CULLOP. Yes, sir; lines 8 to 11, I will inform the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. And the gentleman from Indiana claims, what?

Mr. CULLOP. That it is not authorized by law, that under the rules of the House the jurisdiction for the construction of public buildings is vested in the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. CANNON. But the gentleman must recollect that this is an appropriation bill, and there is no rule of the House that authorizes or that would make in order an appropriation upon a public-buildings bill reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Their duties are legislative, not appropriation duties. And I will say further to the gentleman, that the sundry civil bill always carries an appropriation for public buildings, but the legislation must be enacted before the appropriation would be in order.

Mr. CULLOP. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois this question.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. An appropriation would not be in order for a public building until the Public Buildings Committee had reported and provided for it in a bill and directed the authorization?

Mr. CANNON. But I assume the fact that this is for the construction of a building at the experiment station at Bethesda, Md. Now, the gentleman from Indiana makes the point of order that we have not jurisdiction. I take it for granted we have the site, that there is an experiment station. Does the gentleman say you could not build a hencoop—

Mr. CULLOP. Oh, no. I entertain no such ideas about this matter.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman say you could not build an outhouse by appropriation because it was not authorized by law? Why, repairs and construction of buildings incident to an experiment station are, as I understand it, in order. The gentleman may say this is a $16,000 building and, according to the argument made, you could not build a $16 building. It seems to me the position is perfectly untenable and the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. CULLOP. But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois uses extreme illustrations, all of which are not probable. There is nothing appearing here which meets the case which the gentleman from Illinois has presented to the committee. So far as this is concerned it is the construction of a new building independent of any other building. It is the beginning of a new enterprise, and I insist that under the rules of the House before we have the right to make the appropriation there must come from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds the establishment of such a building and an authorization of the same, and I think that the precedents will show that that has been the practice when the question was raised. I am desirous of safeguarding all expenditures as much as possible.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. If the Chair sustains the point of order it is that this particular provision belongs within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It appears by the rules of the House that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have no jurisdiction of appropriations for public buildings, and therefore that point of order is overruled.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida moves to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not opposed to the construction of this building; or, rather, I do not know whether I am or not; I do not know anything about it; but I do insist that this is a provision for the construction of a building. It is not simply an appropriation of money for the use of the Department of Agriculture. It is a direct provision for the construction of a building, and I submit that this committee has no jurisdiction whatever in reference to it.

Now, it reads:

For construction of buildings at Bureau Experiment Station at Bethesda, Md., and the Bureau Experiment Farm at Beltsville, Md., $16,500.

The Committee on Agriculture, the committee which brings in this bill, has not any jurisdiction, Mr. Chairman, for the consideration of a matter of this kind. Under the rule anything relating to agriculture and forestry goes to the Committee on Agriculture, which shall receive the estimates and report the appropriations for the Agricultural Department. And in the citations under that rule I insist that no precedent can be found for the construction outright of a new building. There is no pretense here that this building has been provided for. There is no pretense here that any committee having jurisdiction has made an authorization for such a building, but it is a new item entirely wherein this committee undertakes to have jurisdiction of a matter which properly belongs to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that is about all I desire to say in support of the motion to strike out. If this building is needed they could go before the proper committee and get the necessary authority.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Florida to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

And hereafter the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to sell in the open market or to exchange for other breeding animals or animal products to the best advantage, without the usual condemnation proceedings and public auction, such animals or animal products produced or purchased under the appropriations made by Congress for the use of the Bureau of Animal Industry as may not be needed in the work of that bureau: Provided, That all moneys received from the sale of such animals or animal products, or as a bonus in the exchange of the same, shall be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph last read. Now, that is entirely new legislation. And, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I am making the point of order because it is new legislation and it uses the words "and hereafter" the Secretary shall do so and so. I am determined when some man in the future raises the question of this jurisdiction being conferred he shall not make the same argument as that made to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order on the word "hereafter"?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I make the point of order—

Mr. CANDLER. This provision is in the interest of economy, and in order to save expense by getting the very best price for animals that will be sold or exchanged.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will say to the gentleman that I am opposed to giving the Secretary, or anybody else, power to sell Government property at private sale.

Mr. LAMB. I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF PLANT INDUSTRY.

Salaries, Bureau of Plant Industry: One plant physiologist and pathologist, who shall be chief of bureau, $5,000; 1 chief clerk, $2,250; 1 executive assistant in seed distribution, $2,250; 1 officer in charge of publications, $2,000; 1 landscape gardener, $1,800; 1 officer in charge of records, $2,000; 1 superintendent of seed weighing and mailing, $2,000; 1 executive clerk, $2,250; 2 executive clerks, at $1,980 each; 3 executive assistants, at $1,800 each; 1 assistant superintendent of seed warehouse, $1,400; 1 seed inspector, $1,000; 6 clerks, class 4; 11 clerks, class 3; 2 clerks or botanical translators, at $1,500 each; 15 clerks, class 2; 38 clerks, class 1; 1 clerk, $1,140; 1 clerk, $1,080; 3 clerks, at $1,020 each; 26 clerks, at $1,000 each; 56 clerks, at $900 each; 23 clerks, at $840 each; 13 clerks, at $720 each; 33 messengers, gardeners, or laborers, at $720 each; 11 messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $660 each; 15 messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $600 each; 1 artist, $1,620; 1 photographer, $1,140; 1 photographer, $1,080; 1 laboratory aid, $1,440; 1 laboratory aid, $1,380; 3 laboratory aids, at $1,200 each; 1 laboratory aid, $1,080; 2 laboratory aids, at $1,020 each; 5 laboratory aids, at $840 each; 6 laboratory aids, at $720 each; 6 laboratory aids, at $600 each; 1 laboratory apprentice, $720; 1 map tracer, $720; 1 map tracer, $600; 1 gardener, $1,440; 2

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I want to reserve a point of order on that and get some information.

Mr. LAMB. You can get that to-morrow. I now move that the committee rise.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Let me state what it is. In line 22, page 17, beginning with the words "one mechanic," down to the word "dollars," in line 2, on page 18, I see they provide for four mechanics, and I wanted some information as to what were their duties.

Mr. LAMB. We can start to-morrow morning on that.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. All right. I just wanted to submit the interrogation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] reserves the point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BORLAND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 18960) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 13570, "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act granting to certain employees of the United States the right to receive from it compensation for injuries sustained in the course of their employment,' approved May 30, 1908," with Senate amendments, and I ask that the Senate amendments be read.

The Senate amendments were read, as follows:

Line 3, strike out "on and after the passage of this act."
Line 10, after "mines," insert "for the Forestry Service of the United States."
Line 12, after "to," strike out "its passage" and insert "the 1st day of January, 1912."

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House disagree to the last amendment and agree to the first two amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the first two amendments and disagreeing to the last amendment.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

BENJAMIN F. MARTZ.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be permitted to call up at this time bill S. 2453, the first bill on the Private Calendar, which is a bill to confirm title in a couple of homestead entries which has been sent here by the Department of the Interior. This is Private Calendar day, and I think it would take but a few minutes to dispose of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Let the gentleman ask unanimous consent.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that the bill which the Clerk will report shall be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have the bill read, so that I can see what it is.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2453) for the relief of Benjamin F. Martz, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the homestead entry of Benjamin F. Martz on farm unit "N," Huntley reclamation project, Montana, under the act of June 17, 1902, on sections 17 and 20, township 2 north, range 28 east, Montana meridian, is hereby validated, subject to future compliance with the law.

Sec. 2. That the homestead entry of Gjerluf Hanson on farm unit "A," on the Bellefourche reclamation project, South Dakota, under the act of June 17, 1902, for the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 21, township 8 north, range 6 east, Black Hills meridian, is hereby validated, subject to future compliance with the law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARDWICK. And that is, by what parliamentary right this bill is now considered?

The SPEAKER. This is Private Calendar day.

Mr. HARDWICK. Is the calendar called in order? Is this the first bill on the calendar?

The SPEAKER. This is the first bill on the calendar, and the Committee on Agriculture, with its appropriation bill, crowded the private-bill day out pro tanto. But it is in order to move to go into Committee of the Whole to consider this bill, and the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] simply asked that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARDWICK. One further question, Mr. Speaker. Is this bill unanimously reported by the committee? Is there no objection to it in committee?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. It has been unanimously reported.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to state for the information of the gentleman from Georgia that the Committee on the Public Lands has gone into the matter fully and made two investigations of the matter and received two reports from the department on both occasions and has unanimously reported the bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is entirely satisfactory to me.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, inadvertently there is a mistake in the description as read, one line being left out. To correct that mistake, I offer an amendment and ask to have it considered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 13, page 1, by inserting after the word "quarter," where it first appears in said line, the words "and the northeast quarter."

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I will explain that amendment. The report of the department gives the description correctly, but the print leaves out that line, which would make it a 10-acre piece instead of an 80-acre piece, which is a homestead entry.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the amended Senate bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 4551. An act to extend the time for completion of a dam across the Savannah River, at or near the mouth of Stevens Creek, between the counties of Edgefield, S. C., and Columbia, Ga., authorized by an act approved August 5, 1909.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 4978. An act to supplement and amend the act entitled "An act to incorporate the North River Bridge Co. and to authorize the construction of a bridge and approaches at New York City across the Hudson River, to regulate commerce in and over such bridge between the States of New York and New Jersey, and to establish such bridge a military and post road," approved July 11, 1890; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. YOUNG of Texas, indefinitely, on account of illness in family.

To Mr. McHENRY, for two weeks, on account of illness.

To Mr. DAVENPORT, for 10 days, on account of important business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 46 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, March 2, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Acting Secretary of the Interior submitting an estimate of an appropriation for purchasing a motor boat for use of special agents of the General Land Office operating in District of Alaska (H. Doc. No. 584); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, transmitting and requesting favorable consideration by Congress draft of a bill authorizing the use of the unexpended balance of the appropriation for storehouse and dock at San Juan, P. R., for the alteration, repair, and construction of necessary buildings and dock and improvements of the grounds of the reservation of San Juan, P. R. (H. Doc. No. 585); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, March 2, 1912.

The Senate met at 2 o'clock p. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings when, on request of Mr. GALLINGER and by unanimous consent the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2453) for the relief of Benjamin F. Martz, and for other purposes, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 1 and 2 to the bill (H. R. 13570) to amend an act entitled "An act granting employees of the United States the right to receive from it compensation for injuries sustained in the course of their employment," approved May 30, 1908; and had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate No. 3 to the bill.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 4551) to extend the time for completion of a dam across the Savannah River, at or near the mouth of Stevens Creek, between the counties of Edgefield, S. C., and Columbia, Ga., authorized by an act approved August 5, 1909.

Mr. WETMORE. I present a resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island, which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The resolution was read and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND, IN GENERAL ASSEMBLY,
January Session, A. D. 1912.

Resolution requesting the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Rhode Island to urge the present Congress to secure the establishment of a lightship near Block Island:

Whereas a reef which extends about 1 mile in a northerly direction from the north end of Block Island is so far offshore that the strong tidal currents running across it make a very dangerous obstruction for any vessels entering Block Island; and

Whereas it is of the greatest importance to the people and the maritime interests of New England that a lightship be stationed off the north end of Block Island; and

Whereas a petition has been circulated and signed by the most important marine, shipping, and steamship men of New England requesting that such a lightship be established: Therefore be it

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island, That the Senators and Representatives of the State in the Congress of the United States be, and are hereby, requested to urge the present Congress to secure the establishment of a lightship with a first-class fog siren and lights, about 1 mile northerly from the north end of Block Island.

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Providence, February 29, 1912.

I hereby certify the foregoing to be a true copy of the original resolution approved by his excellency the governor on the 28th day of February, A. D. 1912.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the State aforesaid the date first above written.

[SEAL.]

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back with amendments the bill (H. R. 17681) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the Government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 434) thereon. I give notice that at the earliest opportunity I will ask that the bill be taken up for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 1086) to amend sections 680 and 686 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 433) thereon.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 5309) to amend section 3 of the act of Congress approved May 14, 1880 (21 Stat. L., p. 140), reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 435) thereon.

Mr. DIXON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 5076) to promote instruction in forestry in States and Territories which contain national forests, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 437) thereon.

Mr. STEPHENSON, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (S. 5355) to acquire a site and for the erection thereon of a public building at Beaver Dam, Wis., reported it without amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each with amendments, and submitted reports thereon:

S. 5077. A bill providing for the erection of a Federal building at Pocatello, Idaho (Rept. No. 438); and

S. 248. A bill providing for the erection of a Federal building at Cœur d'Alene, Idaho (Rept. No. 439).

NEW LAND DISTRICT IN MONTANA.

Mr. DIXON. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably with an amendment in the nature of a substitute the bill (S. 5075) for the establishment of a new land district in the State of Montana, and I submit a report (No. 436) thereon. I should like to ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill. The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

Beginning in the mid-channel of the Missouri River at a point where the eastern boundary of the State of Montana intersects the same; thence south along said State boundary to its intersection with the township line between townships 9 and 10 north; thence west to the southwest corner of township 10 north, range 58 east; thence north to the northwest corner of said township; thence west to the southwest corner of township 11 north, range 56 east; thence north to the northwest corner of said township; thence west to the southwest corner of township 12 north, range 55 east; thence north to the northwest corner of said township; thence west along the third standard parallel north to its intersection with the eleventh guide meridian; thence north along said guide meridian between ranges 44 and 45 east, allowing for proper offsets, to its intersection with the mid-channel of the Missouri River; thence easterly, following the mid-channel of said river, to its intersection with the eastern boundary of Montana, the place of beginning.

Sec. 2. That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is hereby authorized to appoint a register and receiver for such land district, who shall discharge like and similar duties and receive the same amount of compensation as other officers discharging like duties in the other land offices of said State.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 5006) to provide for repairs and improvements at the lighthouse depot and headquarters, San Juan, P. R.; to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (S. 5007) for the relief of Michael R. Morgan and others; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 5008) providing for the abandonment of the Vashon Island Military Reservation in the State of Washington, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CULBERSON (for Mr. TAYLOR):

A bill (S. 5009) for the relief of the estate of John T. McClanahan; and

A bill (S. 5010) to pay the Southern Express Co. charges for carrying tents to Pulaski, Tenn.; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 5011) granting an increase of pension to David P. Wilcox (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 5012) granting a pension to Robert Donson (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Maine:

A bill (S. 5013) granting a pension to Raymond R. Hammond (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 5014) granting a pension to Mary J. Chick (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 5015) to correct the naval record of Thomas Taylor; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. REED:

A bill (S. 5016) for the relief of the heirs of John A. Winn, deceased; and

A bill (S. 5017) for the relief of Frank Schilling (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. POINDEXTER:

A bill (S. 5018) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish in the Department of the Interior a Bureau of Mines," approved May 16, 1910; to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 5019) granting an increase of pension to Michael Hilli; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WETMORE:

A bill (S. 5020) to construct and place a lightship near the north end of Block Island, R. I. (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. GORE:

A bill (S. 5021) to extend time of payment of balance due for lands sold under act of Congress approved June 17, 1910 (with accompanying paper); and

A bill (S. 5022) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to subdivide and extend the deferred payments of settlers in the Kiowa-Comanche and Apache ceded lands in Oklahoma (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. HEYBURN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $3,000 for conducting experiments in the breeding and raising of fur-bearing animals, the mink and marten, intended to be proposed by him to the agricultural appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $500 to reimburse Peter Mactelmy for damages sustained by him because of the sale by the United States to the State of Idaho of land for State park on a portion of which Peter Mactelmy made his home, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $500 to reimburse the State board of regents of the University of Idaho for the premium paid on an indemnity bond on account of the loss of a United States draft for $25,000 in transit between the United States Treasury and the State treasury of Idaho, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SURVEY BETWEEN PUGET SOUND AND COLUMBIA RIVER.

Mr. JONES submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 16), which was read and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring). That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause preliminary examination and survey to be made, and a report to be made thereon to Congress, of the intervening territory between Puget Sound and the Columbia River, with a view to determining the advisability of constructing a canal connecting Puget Sound with Grays Harbor, Willapa Harbor, and the Columbia River.

IMPROVEMENT OF COLUMBIA RIVER.

Mr. JONES submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 17), which was read and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring). That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to submit, as early as practicable, an estimate of the cost of the improvement of the Columbia River from and including Grand Rapids to the international boundary line.

PACIFIC STATES TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH CO. V. STATE OF OREGON.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask to have printed as a public document the record in the Oregon case where the Supreme Court held constitutional the initiative and referendum amendment to the Oregon constitution. I ask to have the request referred to the Committee on Printing before action is taken by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

PRINTING OF NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW ARTICLE.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask to have printed as a public document an article which appeared in the February number of the North American Review, by Leander T. Chamberlain, entitled "A chapter of national dishonor," the same being a historical and critical review of the proceedings which led up to and culminated in the creation of the Panama Republic.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order will be entered.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to inquire whether the article is copyrighted or not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is copyrighted; but I have secured the permission of the North American Review to have it printed as a public document with the approval of the Senate, providing that proper credit is given.

Mr. HEYBURN. The North American Review may not be able to stop the train after they have started it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I object to the request until I know something more than the statement made as to what the article is.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is an article which has been widely read. I am rather surprised that the Senator from Utah has not read it or heard of it. It is one of the leading articles of the month, and appearing as the leading article in the North American Review, it has secured a prominence and attracted an amount of attention which has commanded a great deal of comment.

Mr. HEYBURN. What is it about?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. As I have stated, it is a historical and analytical article of the facts of which I spoke yesterday here in the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator what is the reason for requesting that it be printed as a public document?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Because I think it tends very much to illuminate the history of that more or less obscure proceeding, and because I believe that it is a subject on which there is a great deal of public interest and on which the Senate may act. I believe it is written in a temperate vein by a man who is an experienced and recognized publicist, and it is a considerable addition to the literature of the day.

Mr. SMOOT. There are so many articles published in magazines that if we should undertake to publish them all as public documents we would have our mails full all the time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is quite true; I concede that; but I wish to say to the Senator from Utah that I am not a great offender. I think I am one of few Senators in the Chamber who never before asked for the publication of anything as a public document.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that is true.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I make this request only because I believe the article is worthy of publication as a document, and I think the Senator from Utah will concede it if he examines the article.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will allow it to be referred to the Committee on Printing, I will assure him that the committee will meet within the next few days and report it back.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator desires to examine it first, and will give us an assurance of an early report, that will be perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. SMOOT. I would rather have it go to the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the matter, with the request of the Senator from Nebraska, will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

THE LAWRENCE (MASS.) STRIKE.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of Senate resolution 231, calling on the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to report to the Senate certain information in regard to the condition of the mill workers in Lawrence, Mass., through the Bureau of Labor.

The resolution has been objected to here principally on account of the last clause in the resolution, directing him to report as to "what action has been taken by the local authorities at Lawrence to forcibly interfere with the free passage of said aliens or others from the city of Lawrence and State of Massachusetts to other States." I believe the objections were based on that provision. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be amended by striking out the words which I have just read, and that as amended it be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate resolution 231, that the concluding paragraph thereof be eliminated, and that the resolution as thus amended be passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, there can be no objection to the Senator amending the resolution by unanimous consent, but I shall object to its present consideration. The Senator can—

The VICE PRESIDENT. It can not very well be amended without being considered.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator can give notice that he will offer that amendment when the resolution is up again. I object to its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I do not want to be misunderstood in reference to the purpose of my suggested amendment. I thought possibly it would secure the adoption of the resolution as amended. I do not care to offer the amendment unless—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so understood.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not care to offer the amendment if the consideration of the resolution is objected to. I desire to give notice that, in view of the fact that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Bristow] is engaged in an address on the Stephenson case, I will not attempt to bring this matter up again to-day, but I will move the adoption of the resolution on Monday.

SENATOR FROM WISCONSIN.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 299.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho requests that the following business be laid before the Senate.

The SECRETARY. Order of Business 299: Senate resolution 136, directing the Committee on Privileges and Elections to investigate certain charges relative to the election of ISAAC STEPHENSON and the motion made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] that the report of the committee thereon be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas will proceed.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, when the Senate adjourned last evening I was reading from the testimony of Mr. Perrin, of Superior, Wis., who had received $5,000 from the Stephenson fund, and who had disbursed a part of it. Perrin had disbursed, so he said, some $350 of this fund to a Mr. Fridley, and also a part of it to Mr. Shields. Perrin received this $5,000 in three installments. On the 30th of July he received $1,000 from Mr. Edmonds, on the 4th of August another $1,000, and on the 14th of August $3,000 more.

The question was asked a number of times yesterday as to whether any of these men that received money were opposed to Mr. STEPHENSON before they received the money and afterwards supported him, so I desire to call to the attention of Senators the testimony of Perrin, which has a bearing upon this point. He was asked by the chairman of the subcommittee:

Do you know of any act or thing which he did because of the receipt of that money?

That question was asked of Perrin in interrogating him as to what Shields did with the money which Perrin had given Shields. His answer was:

Mr. PERRIN. I know that some people were active for the Senator after I gave him the money that were not before—that is, a certain class.

The CHAIRMAN. What is that class?

Mr. PERRIN. It would be mostly members of the Catholic Church.

The CHAIRMAN. Then that influence, you think, went in that direction?

Mr. PERRIN. I think so.

The CHAIRMAN. On the same day, the 26th, we have items of cash, $50, $50, $50, $50. They are all on August 26. Who got that money? Mr. PERRIN. They are all cash items?

The CHAIRMAN. They are cash items; but one of them is indorsed by "R. J. Agen, Sec'y."

Mr. PERRIN. He did not have the money. I think that was cash.

The CHAIRMAN. And C. R. Fridley. Did Mr. Fridley have the money?

Mr. PERRIN. He had the money where his name appears.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is Mr. Fridley?

Mr. PERRIN. He is the attorney to whom I referred a few moments ago.

The CHAIRMAN. * * * We will proceed to the 27th. We have three items on the 27th of $10 each—one to J. W. Wilson, one to L. H. Mead, and one to Robert Inglis. Were those sums paid to those men for their use?

Mr. PERRIN. To be used by them in this campaign.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they use those sums of money?

Mr. PERRIN. So far as I am advised.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know for what?

Mr. PERRIN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Were they compensation to those men personally or to be expended by them?

Mr. PERRIN. To be expended.

The CHAIRMAN. All of them?

Mr. PERRIN. So far as I can recollect now.

The CHAIRMAN. On the 28th we have three items—two of cash, $50 and $50, and one of $25 to D. M. Maxey, and indorsed by him. Can you account for the cash items?

Mr. PERRIN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you account for the Maxey item?

Mr. PERRIN. Yes. That is, it was sent to him to be paid to men to attend the polling places on primary day in the interest of Senator STEPHENSON.

The CHAIRMAN. To attend the polling places for what?

Mr. PERRIN. For the purpose of disseminating information in regard to Senator STEPHENSON's qualifications.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you ever present when any of these men were disseminating information?

Mr. PERRIN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You have no idea as to the manner in which they disseminated it, or of the substance of the information?

Mr. PERRIN. Certainly not; no, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. We come now to the 29th. There are three items on the 29th: $150 cash—can you account for that or any part of it?

Mr. PERRIN. I do not remember.

The CHAIRMAN. Forty-five dollars to T. W. McManus. What was that for?

Mr. PERRIN. May I look at that item?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. PERRIN. That was for advertisement of Senator STEPHENSON's candidacy in some publication that he was in charge of, gotten out, I think, for use on Labor Day.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that a labor paper?

Mr. PERRIN. It was not a paper in that sense. It was, I think, simply a program with advertisements.

The CHAIRMAN. On the 31st there is an item of $300 cash. Can you account for that or any part of it?

Mr. PERRIN. I do not remember.

The CHAIRMAN. That was received by you? All of these cash items were received by you, were they?

Mr. PERRIN. Yes. I do not know that I went to the bank and got them myself.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it the fact that the checks were drawn payable to "cash"?

Mr. PERRIN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. R. J. Shields, $250; That is without any date.

Mr. PERRIN. That $250 to R. J. Shields was paid to him out of the first check that I received from Mr. Edmonds.

The CHAIRMAN. You say in regard to that item, on page 1922, that you have the checks for all except that item, and it does not show on its face. Is that the item that you refer to now?

Mr. PERRIN. Yes. When I got that check I indorsed it over to him; and he gave me back his check, as I remember it now, for $750.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Shields did?

Mr. PERRIN. Yes. So that that payment to him was not covered by a check.

(Page 667.)

The CHAIRMAN. For what did you pay that money to Mr. Shields?

Mr. PERRIN. For use in Mr. STEPHENSON's campaign.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have him account to you for it?

Mr. PERRIN. I do not think he ever did.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever ask him to account?

Mr. PERRIN. I did. He said he had expended it for Mr. STEPHENSON.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ask for an itemized statement?

Mr. PERRIN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And he never rendered any?

Mr. PERRIN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not know what he expended it for?

Mr. PERRIN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I want to know a little more about Shields. You must have been very well acquainted with him.

Mr. PERRIN. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. In that you handed him over that check and gave him $250 out of it.

Mr. PERRIN. I am very well acquainted with him.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have a conversation with him at the time you handed it over to him?

Mr. PERRIN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Tell us the conversation—what he said to you and what you said to him that resulted in the handing over of that check.

Mr. PERRIN. I can not remember the details.

The CHAIRMAN. Give us the substance.

Mr. PERRIN. The substance of it was that I went to him and asked him if he would put in some time in the Stephenson campaign. He said he would do what he could. I asked him how much money he thought he would need at that time, and he said that he ought to have $250.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you tell him that you were disbursing Stephenson money at that time? You told him you had received this thousand dollars, did you?

Mr. PERRIN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And he told you he could be of some use to Senator STEPHENSON, did he?

Mr. PERRIN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. How did he tell you he could be of use to Senator STEPHENSON?

Mr. PERRIN. I guess I know as much about that as he did. I do not know that he expressed himself in specific terms as to what he could do or would do.

The CHAIRMAN. What did he do for STEPHENSON's campaign?

Mr. PERRIN. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. You say you knew what he could do?

Mr. PERRIN. I knew what he could do; certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that to be taken as a criterion of what he did do?

Mr. PERRIN. It was by me.

The CHAIRMAN. What did he do?

Mr. PERRIN. Taking that as a criterion, he could, and I believe he did, get men interested for Senator STEPHENSON that neither Senator STEPHENSON, Mr. Edmonds, nor I could otherwise get.

The CHAIRMAN. Get men that you could not get?

Mr. PERRIN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. How would he get them interested? What would he do?

Mr. PERRIN. I think he would mostly talk.

The CHAIRMAN. What would he say to them?

Mr. PERRIN. I am sure I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. What would be the nature of the conversation?

Mr. PERRIN. I would not undertake to say.

The CHAIRMAN. How do you know it is not just exactly the conversation you or Mr. Edmonds would have had with these people?

Mr. PERRIN. Because I know that I could not talk to some of those people the way Mr. Shields could.

The CHAIRMAN. If you do not know what he said to them, how do you know that?

Mr. PERRIN. There are things, you know, that we know without being able to explain or express after long years of acquaintance with a man; that no man living can sit on the witness stand and detail.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Shields had something over $300 as compensation—either he for talking or those to whom he talked for listening. How was it expended?

Mr. PERRIN. Or for those to whom he talked, to talk also.

The CHAIRMAN. Then do you think they shared in the $300—the listener and the speaker?

Mr. PERRIN. And the other listeners. I carry that further than the one step. I think these men to whom he talked talked to a great many other people.

The CHAIRMAN. It was a sort of endless chain—talking to one man, and he to somebody else, and that man in turn to somebody else?

Mr. PERRIN. I hoped it would be so.

The CHAIRMAN. "Sending it down the line?"

Mr. PERRIN. That expresses it thoroughly.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did the money stop? How far did the money follow that conversation down the line?

Mr. PERRIN. Oh, I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. You have not any idea?

Mr. PERRIN. It is impossible to trace that money to the ultimate consumer.

The CHAIRMAN. How much of this money indicated by the cash items or the checks remained in your hands?

Mr. PERRIN. Not a cent.

The CHAIRMAN. And yet you can not account for a cent of it that you paid out?

Mr. PERRIN. I can not in detail; no, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Not a single item?

Mr. PERRIN. Not one.

The CHAIRMAN. That was rather a spectacular campaign in some respects, was it not, with money flowing out freely in those amounts?

Mr. PERRIN. To speak in the vernacular, I guess we got them "going some."

The CHAIRMAN. You can not remember a single instance that happened in that exciting time?

Mr. PERRIN. I do not remember the people to whom I paid the money.

The CHAIRMAN. Not one?

Mr. PERRIN. Not one.

Perrin was interrogated by Senator SUTHERLAND, as follows (p. 681):

Senator SUTHERLAND. Can you approximate in any way the number of people to whom you paid money, irrespective of the amount?

Mr. PERRIN. No, sir; no, sir.

Senator SUTHERLAND. Would it go up into the hundreds of people—less than 100 or more than 100?

Mr. PERRIN. I should think less than 100.

Senator SUTHERLAND. Less than 100?

Mr. PERRIN. I rather think so. I do not want to be understood as swearing positively to that.

Senator SUTHERLAND. You paid them amounts ranging from what to what?

Mr. PERRIN. Oh, from $5 to sometimes as high as $150, depending upon what I expected the man to do, where he could work, and what he could accomplish.

Thirty-one hundred and fifty-five dollars of this money was drawn by him out of the bank account in cash. Over $2,500 of this cash was expended in the month of August, and yet the man who expended it states under oath that he can not remember a single individual to whom he paid a dollar of that cash.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it might be more accurate to say that this money was drawn in August.

Mr. BRISTOW. Well, of course, I am taking the witness's statement, and he says he drew it in August and expended every cent of it. This witness has not told what he knows about this campaign. There is no complaint anywhere on the part of STEPHENSON's friends that he did not account for this money to their satisfaction. It is intimated that he appropriated it to his own use. It was given, as I have said, in three items, running from the 30th of July to the 14th of August. To my mind, that money was used or was given for one of two purposes—to buy Perrin and secure his support for STEPHENSON, depending upon him to disburse it as he saw fit in securing the support that he could for this $5,000, or it was given to him to be disbursed to different individuals, leaving it to his judgment as to whom it should be paid. It evidently was for one of those two reasons. Either one, in my judgment, is an improper use of money in a campaign.

I might continue to read pages of testimony similar to that which I have been reading, but it is unnecessary. The testimony of this confidential agent of STEPHENSON demonstrates the corrupt use of money, if such a thing is possible in an election.

I am not a lawyer, and therefore not skilled in construing and misconstruing the words and phrases of the English language, but the statutes of Wisconsin make bribery a penal offense, and, among other things, they declare:

Every person who shall, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, make any such gift, loan, offer, promise, procurement, or agreement as aforesaid, to or for any person in order to induce such person to procure or endeavor to procure the election of any person to a public office or the vote of any voter at any election—to be guilty of bribery. The statutes also apply the laws relating to a general election to the primary election. If the employment of Wayland, Perrin, and others as indicated by the testimony that I have read is not in violation of this statute, then I must admit that I can not properly understand what this statute means.

The statutes of the State of Wisconsin also provide that—

Every person * * * who shall give or offer to give any valuable thing or bribe to any officer, inspector, or delegate * * * or who shall give or offer to give any valuable thing or bribe to any elector as a consideration for some act to be done in relation to such caucus or convention * * * shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished in the manner hereinafter provided.

Mr. REED. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator kindly read again the section of the statute that refers to the improper use of money?

Mr. BRISTOW. The one I have just read?

Mr. REED. The one the Senator has just read.

Mr. BRISTOW. It is as follows:

Every person * * * who shall give or offer to give any valuable thing or bribe to any officer, inspector, or delegate * * * or who shall give or offer to give any valuable thing or bribe to any elector as a consideration for some act to be done in relation to such caucus or convention * * * shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished in the manner hereinafter provided.

Now, the law makes this applicable to a primary election as well as to a caucus or an election.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I make an inquiry of the Senator from Kansas?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACON in the chair). Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is whether STEPHENSON has been indicted or presented to the grand jury for anything in connection with this election or a violation of any statute.

Mr. BRISTOW. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will give the Senator the benefit of my knowledge.

Mr. OVERMAN. I can not hear the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have knowledge, obtained from inquiry of officials, that no prosecution has been instigated or proposed during all these years against any of the parties charged with violating this imaginary law.

Mr. BRISTOW. That these agents or scouts of STEPHENSON violated this statute I can not see how any reasonable man can doubt. But regardless of whether they violated the statute—indeed, if no such a statute had been in existence—it seems to me that the conduct of these men is indefensible and can not be excused or tolerated.

WILLIAM R. KNEEL.

I now come to a very interesting agent of the Stephenson organization in the campaign, Mr. William R. Knell, who was the Stephenson manager for Milwaukee.

He testified that in organizing and conducting the campaign he expended $11,886.61. He submitted to the legislative committee a statement of the purposes for which he expended this money; $5,748 of this money was paid to ward organizers. There also appears to have been $875.65 expended under the head of "expenses on account of organization." Of this amount there appears to be no statement either by Mr. Knell or anyone else as to what these expenditures were for.

The statutes of Wisconsin make it unlawful for anyone "to give or offer to give any valuable thing or bribe to any officer, inspector, or delegate," yet Knell seems to have paid money to three different election inspectors in Milwaukee.

One Arthur Wilcox was paid $100, he being an election inspector. This was in violation of the statutes of the State.

Leo F. Kelpinski, an inspector of the fifth precinct of the fourteenth ward, was paid $55. And Archie Hamilton, one of the inspectors in the second precinct of the seventeenth ward, was paid $25.

Knell says he did not know at the time he paid these men that they were election inspectors. He was at that time the sheriff of Milwaukee County, and, of course, he can not plead ignorance as a justification of his unlawful acts. He was disbursing this money in such quantities to organizers in the various wards and precincts of the county in which he was serving as sheriff that, even if he was not sensitive as to its moral turpitude, he should at least not have openly violated the plain statutes of his State. Arthur Wilcox, one of the inspectors, had held that office for 10 years, yet the sheriff claims not to have known that he was an inspector. Hamilton claims to have done the work he did for STEPHENSON in a ward other than the one of which he was an inspector. Such a claim is in harmony with the whole spirit of the Stephenson organization—as though a judge of an election who was forbidden to accept any contribution of any kind from any candidate could violate that statute, provided he did his work in some other precinct than the one of which he was an inspector. Hamilton also had been an inspector for about 10 years.

The payment of $55 to Kelpinski, of the fourteenth ward, brought out some interesting incidents. Knell, in commenting upon this payment, relates the following (p. 1773). I should like Senators to listen to this:

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. BROWN. Was the payment of this money to the inspectors by Knell questioned at all by anybody?

Mr. BRISTOW. I think not.

Mr. BROWN. Is it admitted by the sheriff?

Mr. BRISTOW. It is admitted by Knell himself.

Mr. OVERMAN. Knell, you say, was the agent of the organization?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; he was the organizer for Milwaukee County.

Mr. OVERMAN. Now, has the Senator in mind at this time the testimony—my recollection is that there is testimony in the record to show—that the Senator from Wisconsin knew of the agency of this man Knell?

Mr. BRISTOW. Oh, yes; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator from Kansas contend—I want to know his position; I am very much interested in his speech—that the payment by the Senator, or through his agent, to Knell of $11,000, without the knowledge of the Senator himself of the employment of these inspectors in violation of the law, makes the Senator guilty of an offense—violating the law?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not think the Senator could be indicted for it, but my contention is that the accredited agents of Mr. STEPHENSON, in securing this nomination, violated the laws of Wisconsin in so doing and also expended money corruptly.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is no question about that; but to what extent is the Senator from Wisconsin to be held? I want the opinion of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not think the Senator from Wisconsin could be indicted for a crime committed by somebody else, but I think his seat here can be questioned if it was obtained through corrupt means.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator from Kansas recollect that this man Kelpinski was not in the employment—

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator from Utah will pardon me, I will in one minute give the story of Kelpinski in full, and I will give just what he wants to know. But I prefer to do it in this way, because I have it fully covered here.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The only purpose of my inquiry was that Kelpinski was in the employ of Knell—

Mr. BRISTOW. I will tell the story the Senator has in his mind. I am not going to conceal anything. This is an absolutely frank presentation, so far as I have been able to place it before the Senate from the testimony.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Very well.

Mr. BRISTOW. I was just going to call the attention of the Senate to Knell's story of his connection with Kelpinski, and I am giving it to you in his own words—Knell's words:

Leo F. Kelpinski was to receive $110, one-half cash, the balance when the primary was over. He was to look after, I believe, two precincts in the fourteenth ward, two in the eighteenth ward, and one each in the thirteenth and twenty-first wards. A few days after paying him $55 one of my deputies rang me up on an evening, and the following conversation ensued: "Is this the sheriff?" "Yes." "This is Matuszewski." "Well, what is it, Matt?" "I thought you said Leo Kelpinski was working for you." "So he agreed to." "Is he got the money?" "Part of it." "Well, you're done." "Why do you say so?" "I just saw a check for $100 which he cashed in a saloon down here. It was Cook money." "You saw the check? Are you sure of that?" "I saw the check with my own eyes; I can swear to it." I then said, "Well, you know, Matt, that one is got to expect a certain amount of 'double crossing' in politics."

That ended the conversation, and naturally I refused to pay the balance claimed to be due.

Kelpinski says that Richard White, one of Knell's lieutenants, told him that if he would carry the precinct for STEPHENSON he would pay him $100. Kelpinski told him that that would be easy, and that he was going to a picnic the next day, and that it might be well for him to have some of the money, so White paid him $50. But I will give it to you in Kelpinski's own language. He says (p. 1901):

I told him that was easy; if the precinct didn't go for STEPHENSON I didn't want the $100. I says, "But I am going to a picnic to-morrow," as I said before, "and I can spend the money there, and so." I says, "$50 would do." After he gave me the $50 and I started to go out he called me back and he says, "I may be up there myself, but," he says, "if I ain't I will give you $5 more, so you will have enough." And I spent about $75 or $80 that day.

So far the testimony of Kelpinski corroborates that of Knell. He says he received $55 of STEPHENSON's money; Knell says that he paid him $55 and was to pay him some more, but he found out that he was being "double crossed." Kelpinski says that on the day of the picnic he spent $75 or $80. When asked how he spent it, he said:

I went from bar to bar and from ice-cream stand to ice-cream stand, and I told everybody to come on and have a drink on Senator STEPHENSON, and I distributed lots of cards and buttons at that picnic.

Now, there were about 36 of these organizers employed for Milwaukee County.

Apparently Knell did not care how Kelpinski used the money, but he did not want to be "double crossed." He was perfectly willing to pay the price, but he wanted to be certain to receive the goods he was paying for.

Knell's record also shows that he gave William O'Connor, of the fourth ward, $500. Apparently the committee could not find O'Connor; at least it did not take his testimony to find out what he did with the $500 in the fourth ward. O'Connor seems to have had an assistant who received $50. Knell, in testifying as to this expenditure, said (p. 1963):

I gave William O'Connor $500.
The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose?
Mr. KNELL. * * * to look after the fourth ward, in particular the colored vote and the railroad vote adjoining on the south of the fourth ward—that is, in the eighth ward.
Senator POMERENE. $500, you say.
Mr. KNELL. $500; yes.
The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what they did with the money?
Mr. KNELL. I think the greater part of it was spent for that purpose.
The CHAIRMAN. For the same purpose you have indicated?
Mr. KNELL. Yes. I suppose they had themselves paid out of it.
The CHAIRMAN. Those men will not be called, they not being within the reach of the summons. I have no further questions of Mr. Knell.

O'Connor was the superintendent of the garbage hoist of the city of Milwaukee, and probably in his official capacity gave employment to a large number of negroes. He therefore was thought to be a very useful man to the Stephenson organization. So he was given $500 as his part of the boodle.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator, I suppose, has concluded what he has to say about Kelpinski?

Mr. BRISTOW. I have.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator has not discussed the point I had in mind. I understand the Senator to say that Kelpinski was an election inspector, and that Knell must have known of it. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that Knell severed all relations with Kelpinski at least four or five weeks before the primaries were held at all, and Knell says he knew nothing about Kelpinski being an inspector.

Mr. BRISTOW. He says he did not know that any of these men were inspectors.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am speaking of Kelpinski. He did not know Kelpinski was an inspector. Does the Senator know whether Kelpinski was appointed more than four weeks prior to the primary election? I do not know about that myself.

Mr. BRISTOW. It is an office that lasts for two years. They are appointed every two years.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They are appointed two years before?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I call the attention of the Senator to page 1786 of the record, where Knell expressly says his relationship had been severed.

Mr. BRISTOW. After Knell found he was being "double-crossed" he had nothing more to do with Kelpinski. He thought Kelpinski had sold out to the other fellows, and he did not want to buy a man who would not "stick."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. He had nothing to do with him at the time of the primary election. That is the point of my suggestion.

Mr. BRISTOW. I think not. I think they had fallen out over some matters.

Morris Cleary and Alf. J. Klumb, a railroad conductor and locomotive engineer, were paid $450 to look after the sixteenth ward. They were also furnished nine assistants, consisting of a yard man, a railroad man, a foreman, a locomotive engineer, a railroad man, a saloon and restaurant keeper, and three other railroad men, all being paid $25 each, except the saloon and restaurant keeper, who received $10, and one of the railroad men, who received $15, making, all told, $650 that was expended in that ward. Knell, in his testimony, page 1962, was asked:

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose did you give them this money?
Mr. KNELL. For the purpose of organizing the ward by hiring precinct men and primary day workers, distributing literature and cards, and in a general way enhancing the interests of Mr. STEPHENSON.
The CHAIRMAN. Did you have any accounting from these men?
Mr. KNELL. No. They estimated what it would take before I gave them the money.

One A. Rosenheim was the manager in the fourteenth ward. He was a saloon keeper, and he received $325. In his testimony, when asked as to what he did with the money, he said (p. 1886):

I paid out $105 to the workers, and the rest I spent in the saloons wherever I went.

There were about 35 of these ward managers, and the price paid them ranged from $80 to $500. Lee G. Merville, of West Allis, a precinct, was paid $200, and given an assistant, one Pavelick, to whom was paid $30. Mr. H. B. Daggett, of West Milwaukee, was paid $175. He had no assistant. W. R. Jones, of the twenty-second ward, was paid $100, and given two assistants, one of whom was paid $50 and the other $30.

Knell seemed to be a great organizer. He not only had these various ward managers but he had racial managers as well. His account shows that he paid his Greek manager $110 for the campaign, while he paid his Hebrew manager only $45—which seems to me an unwarranted discrimination against the Jew.

Knell's statement of expenditures is as follows.

I will not burden the Senate by reading it; but he goes through and gives quite an elaborate, detailed statement here as to the purposes for which he expended the money and comments on it very frankly. Something over $500 of it was for these ward managers, and between eight and nine hundred dollars was for organization purposes, but what those organization purposes were is not disclosed at all.

By way of explanation I wish to state, with reference to the wards in which the largest amounts have been placed, as follows:
Fourth ward. This ward manager was to look after part of the so- called railroad vote and the colored vote. The colored population of Milwaukee is split into almost as many factions as is the Republican Party and Democratic Party combined. And then some.
Fifteenth ward. This ward manager was to look after the vote of a thickly populated district immediately west of the ward and commonly called Center City. It is in the town of Wauwatosa and not incor- porated.
Sixteenth ward. These ward managers, and the others enumerated, were to look after the so-called railroad vote, the railroad shops, rail- road yards, switch yards, and that part of the town of Wauwatosa ad- joining these different yards and shops, as well as the railroad vote in general in the county.
West Allis. This manager was to look after part of the so-called soldiers' home vote and part of the town of Greenfield.
West Milwaukee. This manager was to look after part of the so- called soldiers' home vote and the northeast part (most thickly popu- lated) of the town of Greenfield.
Fourteenth ward. Leo F. Kelpinski was to receive $110, one-half cash, the balance when the primary was over. He was to look after, I believe, two precincts in the fourteenth ward, two in the eighteenth ward, and one each in the thirteenth and twenty-first wards. A few days after paying him $55 one of my deputies rang me up on an evening and the following conversation ensued: "Is this the sheriff?" "Yes." "This is Matuszewski." "Well, what is it, Matt?" "I thought you said Leo Kelpinski was working for you?" "So he agreed to." "Is he got the money?" "Part of it." "Well, you're done." "Why do say so?" "I just saw a check for $100 which he cashed in a saloon down here. It was Cook money." "You saw the check? Are you sure of that?" "I saw the check with my own eyes, I can swear to it." I then said, "Well, you know, Matt, that one is got to expect a certain amount of 'double-crossing' in politics."
That ended the conversation, and naturally I refused to pay the balance claimed to be due.
Greek manager, Mr. Sarrass, given name and address unknown at this time. He lives in the northwestern part of the city and I meet him occasionally. Mr. Sarrass was to secure the services of, I believe, nine primary-day workers, aggregating $45, and the balance was to be for his services and expenses. About two weeks' work.
Hebrew workers. Mr. Abe Cohen received $45 for which he was to secure eight primary-day workers, aggregating $40, and for the other $5 he was to busy himself on primary day looking after his men.
First ward, 1; fifth ward, 1; sixth ward, 3; ninth ward, 2; tenth ward, 1.
It is unfortunate that the committee has not furnished the Senate with more testimony from these ward managers. From the meager information which the volumes furnished us contain, it seems that the money was largely spent in the Milwaukee saloons by a lot of political scavengers who always had their hands out for boodle. Of course such men as these will always be found in the camp of the candidate who is most willing to put up the money, and in this case Senator STEPHENSON was that candidate.

The four Republican candidates for Senator, according to their statements, expended in this primary the following amounts: STEPHENSON, $107,793.05; Cook, $42,293.29; Hatton, $26,413; and McGovern, $11,063.88. And be it said to the honor of the city of Milwaukee, the candidate who expended the least money and who probably hired none of these political cormorants received more than twice as many votes as did Senator STEPHENSON, who spent $27,000 more than all of the others combined. The vote in Milwaukee was: McGovern, 12,053; Cook, 5,420; STEPHENSON, 5,385; and Hatton, 2,764. Knell says he had employed about 400 workers, hired by him to "make sentiment" for STEPHENSON. Yet Knell, the sheriff of the county, with his 400 mercenaries, was able to secure for his chief only a little over 5,000 votes out of a total of 25,622. STEPHENSON expended more money in Milwaukee County than McGovern expended in the entire State.

LESTER S. DRESSER.

Lester S. Dresser was another one of Edmonds's upstate organizers. He was paid in all $2,350—$2,100 before the primary and $250 immediately after. During the investigation he was asked by the chairman of the Senate subcommittee (p. 998):

What did you do with that money?

Mr. DRESSER. I drew the money and turned it over to different individuals.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom did you turn it over?

Mr. DRESSER. I turned over money to Mr. Nesbit, in Barron County.

The CHAIRMAN. How much did you give Mr. Nesbit?

Mr. DRESSER. $50.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose did you give him $50?

Mr. DRESSER. To go out and look over Barron County and see how the people felt on the senatorial situation.

The CHAIRMAN. In whose interest did you give him that money?

Mr. DRESSER. Senator STEPHENSON's.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose did you give him the money?

Mr. DRESSER. To pay his expenses in traveling over the county talking for Senator STEPHENSON.

The CHAIRMAN. Did he render you an account of the money, as to the expenditure that he had made?

Mr. DRESSER. He did not.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you request him to do so?

Mr. DRESSER. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know for what purpose he spent the money?

Mr. DRESSER. I do not. * * * I gave money to a man in Pierce County.

The CHAIRMAN. What is his name?

Mr. DRESSER. Olof Hall.

The CHAIRMAN. What is his address?

Mr. DRESSER. Ellsworth, Wis.

The CHAIRMAN. How much did you give him?

Mr. DRESSER. $50.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you give him instructions when you gave him the money?

Mr. DRESSER. I told him to look over the county and see what the senatorial situation was and report to me.

The CHAIRMAN. Name the next person to whom you paid any of that money.

Mr. DRESSER. A man by the name of Stevenson, of Menominee, I do not know his first name.

The CHAIRMAN. How much did you pay him?

Mr. DRESSER. $75.

The CHAIRMAN. For the same purpose?

Mr. DRESSER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was that purpose?

Mr. DRESSER. To travel over Dunn County and see what the conditions were, and talk for Senator STEPHENSON.

The CHAIRMAN. Name the next man to whom you paid any money out of this fund; and just continue to name them until you have exhausted your memory, or the fund.

Mr. DRESSER. I paid Mr. Albert Anderson.

The CHAIRMAN. How much?

Mr. DRESSER. When I testified before the other committee my recollection was that it was $150. Afterwards I was talking with Mr. Anderson and he told me that I had made a mistake; that it was $350.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you come to give him the $350?

Mr. DRESSER. He was a bright young man, active in politics.

The CHAIRMAN. For whom was he active?

Mr. DRESSER. For Senator STEPHENSON.

There is always an expression in testimony like this that conveys the real purpose and motive of the man who is handling the fund. He gave this man $350 because he was a bright fellow, an active fellow in politics. To other men he had given $50 and $75. He thought this man was worth more as a Stephenson promoter than the other, and so he paid him more money. The influence of this individual in that political campaign in the mind of Dresser, the agent of Edmonds, was worth more cash than that of these other fellows, and so he made the figure higher. Now, if that is not the corrupt use of money in politics, what is? I should like to have somebody tell me.

The CHAIRMAN. Before you gave him the money?

Mr. DRESSER. He was supporting Senator STEPHENSON, but I do not know that he was active out through the district.

He needed a little more "pepper," as the baseball boys say.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you give him this money to be paid out or to be retained by him?

Mr. DRESSER. It was given him to use as he thought best.

The CHAIRMAN. To pay out as he saw fit or to retain so much?

Mr. DRESSER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know how much he retained for his own services?

Mr. DRESSER. No, sir; I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. Dresser, will you proceed to give the name of another person or persons to whom you paid money?

Mr. DRESSER. Mr. Henry Hetting.

The CHAIRMAN. How much did you pay him?

Mr. DRESSER. He worked throughout the campaign—two months—practically throughout the campaign.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. How much money did he have?

Mr. DRESSER. He had, altogether, in the neighborhood of—well, he spent the rest of the money—seventeen or eighteen or nineteen hundred dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. When you paid Mr. Hetting this money you did not pay it to him all at one time, did you?

Mr. DRESSER. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I notice you enumerate several payments here, running from $150 up to $300 or $350.

Mr. DRESSER. Something like that.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true?

Mr. DRESSER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You paid it to him as he called for it, did you?

Mr. DRESSER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you instruct him as to the manner in which that money was to be expended?

Mr. DRESSER. Why, we talked it over in a general way.

The CHAIRMAN. Was he to distribute any money? You have already stated that he was to travel over the district and distribute literature. Was he to distribute any money?

Mr. DRESSER. He was to get some workers.

The CHAIRMAN. He was to get workers to do the same class of work that he was doing?

Mr. DRESSER. Not the same class of work that he was doing, because he covered the entire district. He was to get some workers for local towns.

The CHAIRMAN. Did Mr. Hetting spend portions of this money for liquor or cigars?

Mr. DRESSER. I presume he did do some treating.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any idea as to the extent of such expenditures?

Mr. DRESSER. No; I have not.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever talk to him about it?

Mr. DRESSER. Yes. He said he usually treated where he went.

The CHAIRMAN. Did he give you any information as to how much money was expended for such purposes?

Mr. DRESSER. If he did, I have forgotten it.

Dresser was a member of the board of control of the State of Wisconsin, a board which has supervision of the asylums and penal institutions of the State, and as such member he travels over the State inspecting such institutions at the public expense. He says he did not charge Mr. STEPHENSON for any expenses in traveling about and supervising the expenditure of his money in the various counties that were assigned to him. He seemed to work directly under the supervision of Senator STEPHENSON, as is shown (p. 1009).

Questions have been asked as to what knowledge Senator STEPHENSON had in regard to a number of these expenditures. A large amount of this money was expended by his agents, and of course he did not know the details. Some of the details he did know. He was familiar with this money which Hetting disbursed, as shown by the following letter:

SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Marinette, Wis., July 14, 1908.

Hon. L. B. DRESSER, St. Croix Falls.

DEAR SIR: Your letter received and contents fully noted. In regard to the work of Mr. Hetting, I have no one in the counties named by you unless it is Mr. T. S. Whitten, of Hayward, of Sawyer County. Whether the management in Milwaukee has anyone I do not know. It may be well to write Mr. Puelicher, of the Marshall & Isley Bank, if he has and who they may be.

If you think it necessary to have anyone to help Mr. Hetting in the counties named, you may employ such help as may be necessary and some one that can be relied upon; will take care of the expense, and have them do the work promptly.

I hope some one will be looking after Douglas. Let me hear from (sic.) when you think best and with all the possible information.

Very truly, yours,

ISAAC STEPHENSON.

Send nomination papers direct to J. H. Puelicher, care of Marshall & Isley Bank, Milwaukee. Send by registered mail.

L. S.

It appears from this testimony that not only were the saloons of Milwaukee subsidized in Mr. STEPHENSON's behalf, but also a part of the State government.

D. E. RIORDAN.

Mr. D. E. Riordan was another one of the Stephenson scouts. He received $3,200 of the Stephenson money, and expended all but about $500, which he retained for his own compensation. He accounted for about $1,200, paid to other individuals, leaving a balance of about $1,500 that he did not account for. In regard to this sum he was asked by Senator POMERENE (p. 787):

Of this $1,500, did you give part to other men to be expended in behalf of Senator STEPHENSON?

Mr. RIORDAN. Not very much of it. If I did it was in small amounts. Senator POMERENE. Then, if I understand you correctly, the most of this $1,500 would go to the "ultimate consumer," as he has been termed here?

Mr. RIORDAN. A great deal of it went for what I regarded as legitimate traveling and incidental expenses, incident to organizing and going through that vast territory.

Senator POMERENE. That is, your own traveling expenses?

Mr. RIORDAN. And those that I asked to accompany me and to come to meet me.

Senator POMERENE. How much of it went to pay your own traveling expenses?

Mr. RIORDAN. I did not keep any itemized account.

Senator POMERENE. Approximately?

Mr. RIORDAN. I am not able to say.

Senator POMERENE. A couple of hundred dollars?

Mr. RIORDAN. Oh, yes; more than that.

Of the $1,200 that he accounted for, Riordan said that he gave $75 to a man named Frank Marteau, who ran an Italian newspaper. He also gave the same man $25 for printing sample ballots. He paid a man named Matt Connor $40 for blank ballots, and a man named Lowell, at Rhinelander, $25 for printing sample ballots. Barney Moran, of the town of Pelican, was paid $50 for attending the polling place and securing workers to instruct the voters how to vote for STEPHENSON. Riordan paid a man named Frank Trimble, of Rhinelander, $60 or $75 for the same purpose. He paid a Mr. Stewart, of Langlade County, $185 to go through the county, handle sample ballots, and create sentiment for STEPHENSON. He also paid Mr. E. A. Everett, of Eagle River, who was then a candidate for the legislature, $250. In regard to this expenditure, the chairman asked him (p. 781):

When you paid it to him did you know that he was a candidate for the assembly?

Mr. RIORDAN. I think I did; certainly. I surely talked with him about it.

The CHAIRMAN. For what did you pay him that sum?

Mr. RIORDAN. For traveling through the counties of Vilas, Iron, and Oneida and ascertaining as far as he was able the sentiment of the people as he went along; that is, those who were for and against each of the several candidates.

Mr. RIORDAN. * * * And if the chairman will permit, I would like to say that this trip, that was made in the first instance by Mr. Everett, in pursuance with this agreement I made with him, was made early. That was the first thing I did after I agreed with Mr. Edmonds to support Senator STEPHENSON and to do some work for him there—to make this arrangement with Mr. Everett and start him out.

That was one of the first services he was employed for. He was hired to go out and work for STEPHENSON.

The CHAIRMAN. You paid him that out of the first $1,000?

Mr. RIORDAN. No; I did not.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you pay it to him?

Mr. RIORDAN. I paid that by check, and I gave it to him along late in August.

The CHAIRMAN. Proceed. To whom other than Mr. Everett did you give money?

Mr. RIORDAN. To Mr. George E. O'Connor.

The CHAIRMAN. How much did you give him?

Mr. RIORDAN. $75.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose did you give him that money?

Mr. RIORDAN. For the same purpose and with the same understanding I had with Mr. Everett, excepting that he was to take a different course in the more rural parts of the district—what we call the mill towns.

That is, Everett was paid $250 to do the same work, practically, covering the same period that O'Connor was paid $75 to do, but in a different part of the country. Now, why Everett $250 and O'Connor $75? That Everett was a candidate for the legislature and his influence was more desirable than O'Connor's is the only conclusion I can draw.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand the Senator to say that Everett was a candidate for the legislature?

Mr. BRISTOW. He was.

Mr. BORAH. I presume he was one who was not elected.

Mr. BRISTOW. He was one who was not elected.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you pay anybody any money, directly or indirectly, for the purpose of inducing them to support Senator STEPHENSON?

Mr. RIORDAN. I did directly, and in a manner that I thought was proper and which was customary.

That is his answer. You will note the qualification that follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Just describe how you did it.

Mr. RIORDAN. The manner in which I provided for the employment of men to handle those sample ballots that I caused to be printed, and to use them on election day.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that the only way? I asked you if you paid any money to any person to secure their influence for Senator STEPHENSON.

Mr. RIORDAN. I misunderstood the question. I thought you said support.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you did not pay any person any money, directly or indirectly, to secure the support of such person for Senator STEPHENSON?

Mr. RIORDAN. No; I did not.

I wondered when I read that what he paid it to him for.

The CHAIRMAN. You may now proceed with any other person to whom you remember having paid portions of this money that you received.

Mr. RIORDAN. B. F. Jillson.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is he?

Mr. RIORDAN. He keeps a hotel at Monico Junction.

The CHAIRMAN. How much did you give him?

Mr. RIORDAN. $50.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose?

Mr. RIORDAN. For use in getting out the vote to the polls and to influence them with the use of the ballots, as I have suggested.

The CHAIRMAN. Make that plain, because that might mean many things. You say "to influence" them with the use of the ballot. Do you mean this sample ballot?

Mr. RIORDAN. Yes; I mean this sample ballot.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anything else? Just recall the question: Did you pay them, or was any money paid them, for anything else than merely to handle sample ballots in the manner that you have described?

Mr. RIORDAN. And to talk to the elector within a proper distance of the polls.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed with the next one to whom you paid money.

Mr. RIORDAN. I paid $50 at the same time to parties who were at his hotel who came there to me from Forest County; but I am unable to give their names or the amounts.

The CHAIRMAN. How much money did you pay them?

Mr. RIORDAN. $50. I paid that to parties at the same time and at the same place that I paid Mr. Jillson the $50.

The CHAIRMAN. To be used for what purpose?

Mr. RIORDAN. To be used for the purpose of employing men at the polling places across the line in Forest County on election day.

The CHAIRMAN. To do what on election day?

Mr. RIORDAN. To attend the polls and electioneer for Senator STEPHENSON.

The CHAIRMAN. Electioneer in what manner?

Mr. RIORDAN. In any lawful and proper manner. There are many ways, I presume.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you admonish them as to the manner in which they were to electioneer and instruct them as to the law?

Mr. RIORDAN. In regard to electioneering?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. RIORDAN. I think I did in nearly every instance—especially in one particular, and that was not to attempt to talk to any elector within 100 feet of the polls.

Riordan gave as his opinion that $200,000 could easily have been spent legitimately in the Stephenson campaign. He fails to account for about $1,500 of the money which Edmonds gave him. Presumably he kept it—to use a common phrase, "knocked it down," or expended it for a purpose which he did not care to divulge. In my opinion, the evidence clearly demonstrates that he did not spend anything like that amount for legitimate traveling expenses during the short time that he was at work. The primaries were held September 1, and Riordan says that his agreement with Edmonds was made the latter part of July, so that if he had traveled continuously he would not have been out to exceed five or six weeks. In dealing with such characters it is impossible to tell how much money "sticks to their fingers." Being engaged in an unlawful business, the party providing them with money can not consistently require them to set down in detail the purposes for which the money is expended. From an affidavit submitted by one C. E. Brady, page 1281 of the hearings, it appears that STEPHENSON's managers did not want these agents of his to make detailed statements to them of the purposes for which the money was expended. Brady's affidavit states that within 30 days after the close of the campaign he called on Edmonds and offered to give him an itemized account of his expenditures, and says further in his affidavit that—

Mr. Edmonds then stated that he had not asked for accounts from those intrusted with the disbursements of money in said campaign, and that he had absolute confidence in the judgment of affiant in the use of said money, and was thoroughly satisfied with the manner in which affiant stated that the same had been used, and that he would much prefer to not take affiant's statement of account so long as he had not received such statements from all other persons similarly situated.

Brady worked in Manitowoc County and received $500 of Stephenson money. It seems, also, that Senator STEPHENSON himself was not at all particular about these scouts of his furnishing itemized statements of their expenditures. One Walter Alexander was an organizer or submanager for the counties of Marathon and Lincoln. In a letter to Alexander, of October 29, 1908, Senator STEPHENSON, among other things, says (page 2038):

Inclosed please find my check for $588.30 in payment of the account which you sent me; it is not necessary for you to itemize the account. I feel very grateful to you, Walter, for the interest you have taken in my canvass and for the effective work which you have done in my behalf.

Mr. REED. Who wrote that letter?

Mr. BRISTOW. Senator STEPHENSON.

I have commented on the subsidizing of Dresser, a member of the board of control of the State of Wisconsin, who received $2,350 of the Stephenson money, which he distributed to men throughout the State for the purpose of inducing them to "create sentiment for STEPHENSON." I now call the attention of the Senate to another very interesting emissary of Mr. STEPHENSON.

J. W. STONE.

J. W. Stone was the State game warden of the State of Wisconsin, and had under him a large number of deputies. I think it better, however, to quote from Mr. Stone himself as to the beginning of his campaign services for Mr. STEPHENSON. On page 1313 of the testimony I find the following:

The CHAIRMAN. Did you receive money from Senator STEPHENSON, or from those representing him, to be used in his behalf during his senatorial campaign before the primaries in 1908?

Mr. STONE. I did.

The CHAIRMAN. How much?

Mr. STONE. Two thousand five hundred dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that all you received?

Mr. STONE. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you not receive $2,849.50?

Mr. STONE. Yes; that is right.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the amount you received?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. When you received the $2,500, in what shape did you receive it?

Mr. STONE. In currency.

The CHAIRMAN. Where?

Mr. STONE. In the Wells Building, I think it was; at the headquarters in the city of Milwaukee.

The CHAIRMAN. From whom?

Mr. STONE. From Mr. Sacket.

The CHAIRMAN. No check or draft was drawn in your favor that you signed?

Mr. STONE. No, sir; not for the $2,500.

The CHAIRMAN. Did Mr. Sacket have the money in his possession when you went to him on that day?

Mr. STONE. I went to Mr. Edmonds first.

The CHAIRMAN. I was referring, though, to Mr. Sacket. When you went into Mr. Sacket's presence, did he have that money with him, or did he go and get it after you went in there?

Mr. STONE. I do not remember seeing Mr. Sacket until he came in with the money.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose was that money given you?

Mr. STONE. It was to be expended in the interest of Mr. STEPHENSON's primary campaign.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it to be expended by you, or were you authorized to pay it out to others, to be expended by them?

Mr. STONE. I was to use it at my own discretion.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you at liberty, then, as you understood the transaction, to handle all that money yourself?

Mr. STONE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. According to your discretion?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. No limitations were placed upon you whatever as to the manner of expenditure, were there?

Mr. STONE. No; I think not.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you pay any part of that money out to others, to be by them distributed or disbursed?

Mr. STONE. I did.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom did you pay it?

Mr. STONE. I paid H. A. Bowman.

The CHAIRMAN. How much?

Mr. STONE. $1,250.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you give him the $1,250?

Mr. STONE. I gave him $500 the day that I received the money.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you next give him money?

Mr. STONE. I gave him $500 in the city of Madison; but I can not tell you the date.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it before or after the primary?

Mr. STONE. Some time in August, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you next give him money?

Mr. STONE. I gave him a check for two hundred and eighty some odd dollars.

Senator POMERENE. What was the amount?

Mr. STONE. I think it was two hundred and eighty some odd dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. That would make $1,280?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose did you give that to Mr. Bowman?

Mr. STONE. For him to use in the interest of Mr. STEPHENSON's campaign.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you tell him the use he was to make of it?

Mr. STONE. I did not.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you discuss with him the manner in which it was to be used?

Mr. STONE. I presume he naturally did—

The CHAIRMAN. What was said as to the manner in which that money was to be used?

Mr. STONE. It was to be expended for workers.

The CHAIRMAN. For workers where?

Mr. STONE. In the different parts of the State where he was located.

The CHAIRMAN. Workers to do what kind of work?

Mr. STONE. Ordinary election work.

The CHAIRMAN. You have now disposed of $1,250 of the $2,500.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. $1,280. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. He received, altogether, $2,849.50. We will assume that you had $1,250 remaining in your hands out of that $2,500, or thereabouts—a difference of a dollar does not matter. What did you do with that?

Mr. STONE. I gave John Craig, of Superior, $75; G. C. Kolb, $50; F. B. Brown, $50; G. W. Dart, $50; A. E. Stores, $20; W. P. Porter, $25; F. A. Tate, $20; a man by the name of Gordon, $25 (I do not know his initials); A. I. Hulbert, $10; E. W. Pierce, $10; E. W. Tuttle, $75; J. Sather, $10; Fred Gerhart, $200. That is all the memorandum I have.

The CHAIRMAN. That accounts for $620. What did you do with the balance of that money?

Mr. STONE. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you spend it?

Mr. STONE. I do not know whether I spent it or not.

The CHAIRMAN. When you say you do not know what you did with it, do you mean to say you do not know whether you lost it or spent it?

Mr. STONE. No, sir. It was deposited with what little money I had in the bank; and these separate sums that I have named are the only record I have of money actually paid to individuals. How much of that money I spent myself in the campaign I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. What did you do during the campaign?

Mr. STONE. Wherever I was I interested myself in Mr. STEPHENSON's campaign.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you pay out money in connection with Senator STEPHENSON's campaign in addition to the sums that you have given us?

Mr. STONE. I undoubtedly did, in the way of entertainment, more or less.

The CHAIRMAN. How much would you say that you paid out?

Mr. STONE. I have not any idea. I could not make an estimate.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you pay out $500?

Mr. STONE. I do not think so.

The CHAIRMAN. $100?

Mr. STONE. I could not say just how much I did pay out.

The CHAIRMAN. You are engaged in the regular business of your office—game warden—were you?

Mr. STONE. At that time; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. During all of that time?

Mr. STONE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You were under pay in the way of salary, or a per diem, or how?

Mr. STONE. Salary.

The CHAIRMAN. How much salary did you receive?

Mr. STONE. $1,800 a year.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what the men whose names you have given did with the sums of money that you have given us?

Mr. STONE. No, sir; I have no personal knowledge of that.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they render you any account?

Mr. STONE. They did not.

The CHAIRMAN. You have no way of knowing what Mr. Gerhart did with the $200?

Mr. STONE. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you pay any of your game wardens, other than Mr. Bowman, any of this money?

Mr. STONE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Which one of the game wardens? Just give us the names of the game wardens. Are they included in the list you gave us?

Mr. STONE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Just indicate, then, so that we may mark them off.

Mr. STONE. Craig.

The CHAIRMAN. Craig is a game warden, is he?

Mr. STONE. Yes, sir. He was at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. STONE. Kolb, Brown, Dart, Stores, Gerhart.

The CHAIRMAN. Porter and Tate were not game wardens, were they?

Mr. STONE. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Or Gordon?

Mr. STONE. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Or Hulbert?

Mr. STONE. Yes, sir; Mr. Hulbert was a game warden.

The CHAIRMAN. Pierce?

Mr. STONE. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Tuttle?

Mr. STONE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What is that name—Sager?

Mr. STONE. Sather. He was not a game warden.

The CHAIRMAN. Gerhart was?

Mr. STONE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That makes eight game wardens. Those are all the moneys you paid those game wardens?

Mr. STONE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You rendered no account of this money to anyone, did you?

Mr. STONE. I did not.

Senator POMERENE. Have you not any recollection as to what became of the balance of this money?

Mr. STONE. No, sir; I have not.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What does the Senator make the balance, please?

Senator POMERENE. He first told us he had paid $1,250 to Bowman. Then, in analyzing that, he gave us two payments of $500 each and one of $280. The other items he gave us total $620. That would make $1,870 or $1,900, if you use $280 as being the amount paid to Bowman.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That leaves a difference of how much?

Senator POMERENE. That would leave $600 out of the $2,500.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes; but there was $349.50 in addition to that. The whole was $2,849.

Senator POMERENE. Can you give us any account of this $349.50?

Mr. STONE. Yes, sir.

Senator POMERENE. What did you do with it?

Mr. STONE. That was sent to me in full in a draft from Mr. Edmonds.

Senator POMERENE. You say that $349.50 was sent to you in full?
Mr. STONE. I mean a check or draft was sent by Mr. Edmonds.

This seems to have been an afterpayment by Edmonds to make up some deficiencies of some kind which Stone claims to have had.

Senator POMERENE. Now go on and tell us what that was to pay for.
Mr. STONE. That was to pay a man by the name of Fridley, at Superior—

Fridley apparently is the attorney that our friend Perrin had employed, and to whom he paid about a thousand dollars. He seems also to have had financial relations with the game warden.

Senator POMERENE. What is his first name?

Mr. STONE. I do not remember now.

Senator POMERENE. How much?

Mr. STONE. I think it was $140. That is my recollection; but I have not any memorandum of that.

Senator POMERENE. Who else?

Mr. STONE. John Craig.

Senator POMERENE. How much?

Mr. STONE. $82, I think it was. It might have been a few cents more.

Senator POMERENE. Is that in addition to the $75 you gave us awhile ago?

Mr. STONE. Yes, sir.

Senator POMERENE. Who else?

Mr. STONE. W. T. Porter.

Senator POMERENE. How much?

Mr. STONE. $80.

Senator POMERENE. Was that in addition to the $25 you gave him?

Mr. STONE. Yes, sir.

Senator POMERENE. Anyone else?

Mr. STONE. That is all.

Stone, in a way, accounts for all but about $600 of the money which Edmonds gave him, and a part of this he says he expended in entertaining, but how much he says he does not remember. He was not asked to account for this money by Edmonds or STEPHENSON. I can not see how any intelligent man can come to any other conclusion from this testimony than that this $2,849.50 was given to Stone as a bribe to secure the influence of himself and his game wardens in the election, and that after he had distributed approximately $2,000 to his assistants, he retained the remainder as his part of this corruption fund which Senator STEPHENSON was distributing so lavishly throughout the State.

But it is interesting to trace this $2,500, which Sacket handed in currency to Mr. Stone, to the "ultimate consumer." Stone testified that he paid John Craig $75 upon one occasion and $80 upon another. I have been unable to find any testimony of Mr. Craig in these volumes, so I presume that the committee did not call him before it, and therefore we can not trace the money which he received to the "ultimate consumer."

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator says Mr. Craig was not called, but every possible effort was made to secure every witness whose name was mentioned by any other witness.

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not doubt that, but some of these men seem to have hid themselves because they did not want the embarrassing experience of testifying.

G. C. KOLB.

But Mr. G. C. Kolb, to whom $50 was paid by Stone, did testify before the committee, and I will give you the cream of his testimony (p. 970):

The CHAIRMAN. Did you receive any money during that campaign from anyone to be spent by you?

Mr. KOLB. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. How much?

Mr. KOLB. $50.

The CHAIRMAN. From whom?

Mr. KOLB. From Mr. Stone.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Give us his full name, please.

Mr. KOLB. J. W. Stone.

The CHAIRMAN. When did Mr. Stone pay you this money?

Mr. KOLB. Oh, I think it was about three or four weeks before the primaries.

The CHAIRMAN. You were a deputy game warden at that time, were you?

Mr. KOLB. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did you receive the money?

Mr. KOLB. I think in Madison.

The CHAIRMAN. What did Mr. Stone say when he gave you that money as to the purpose for which he was giving it to you?

Mr. KOLB. To spend it for the interests of Senator STEPHENSON in his campaign.

The CHAIRMAN. He just gave you general instructions?

Mr. KOLB. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you spend it?

Mr. KOLB. I spent it for cigars and treats.

The CHAIRMAN. All of it?

Mr. KOLB. Yes, sir; and in drug stores. Whenever I would drop into the saloons I would spend it.

The CHAIRMAN. You say in drug stores?

Mr. KOLB. In drug stores; yes. Whenever I would go into a drug store I would buy cigars, and whenever I would drop into a saloon I would buy beer, for instance.

Upon being interrogated by the chairman as to the nature of the saloon campaign, Kolb said:

Whenever I went to the saloons I bought drinks and cigars for the boys.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did you spend it; in what place?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. In what locality? That is what you mean, is it not, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. KOLB. In towns where I would drop in.

The CHAIRMAN. What towns were they?

Mr. KOLB. Oh, they were towns—Elroy, Union, Camp Douglas—through that territory.

The CHAIRMAN. What was your business then?

Mr. KOLB. The saloon business.

The CHAIRMAN. Where?

Mr. KOLB. Hillsboro.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you come to be traveling around?

Mr. KOLB. I would be traveling around as a game warden.

The CHAIRMAN. You were traveling around as a game warden and you were in the saloon business?

Mr. KOLB. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you spend any of this money in your own saloon?

Mr. KOLB. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you alone in the saloon business?

Mr. KOLB. I have bartenders, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You are the proprietor?

Mr. KOLB. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. When you were spending this money with the boys, as you have stated, did you tell them that you were favoring the election of Senator STEPHENSON?

Mr. KOLB. Oh, I just simply said, "Have a drink on Mr. STEPHENSON."

The CHAIRMAN. That is what you would say—"Have a drink on Mr. STEPHENSON"?

Mr. KOLB. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you would pay it out of this $50?

Mr. KOLB. Yes, sir.

So much for Deputy Game Warden Kolb.

I have been unable to find any testimony from Mr. F. B. Brown, to whom Stone says he paid $50. But Mr. George W. Dart, another one of Stone's lieutenants, is a very interesting witness. Stone says he paid Dart $50. Now we will have Mr. Dart's story of the transaction (p. 974):

GEORGE W. DART.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you take any part in Senator STEPHENSON's campaign in 1908, when he was a candidate for the United States Senate?

Mr. DART. Well, slightly.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you receive money from anyone to be used during that campaign in his behalf?

Mr. DART. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. How much did you receive?

Mr. DART. $450.

The CHAIRMAN. From whom did you receive it?

Mr. DART. I received the first $50 from J. W. Stone.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was Mr. Stone?

Mr. DART. Mr. Stone was the State game warden.

The CHAIRMAN. You were a deputy game warden, were you?

Mr. DART. I was a deputy game warden; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How did Mr. Stone come to give you that money?

Mr. DART. He gave it to me to help Mr. STEPHENSON's interest.

The CHAIRMAN. What did he tell you when he gave you the money?

Mr. DART. I have forgotten the exact words.

The CHAIRMAN. What did you do?

Mr. DART. That $50 I took and used to put a man out to put up lithographs.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you pay him $50 for it?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Give us the name of the man to whom you paid this money, if you have it.

Mr. DART. It was my son.

The CHAIRMAN. What is his name?

Mr. DART. George H. Dart.

The CHAIRMAN. So that you gave him the entire $50?

Mr. DART. Yes. He hired a rig and went around putting up lithographs and campaign literature.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you receive any further sum of money for supporting Senator STEPHENSON?

Mr. DART. I do not know just the date of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you get $400 in a check from Mr. Edmonds?

Mr. DART. Yes; I did.

The CHAIRMAN. What did you do with the money?

That was the testimony given before the legislative committee in Wisconsin.

Mr. DART. I spent that. I put it out in different ways.

The CHAIRMAN. Tell us how.

Mr. DART. Paying men to take their teams and turn out to fetch the voters on the primary day.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you spend the entire $400 in that way?

Mr. DART. No.

The CHAIRMAN. How much of that $400 did you pay out to other people?

Mr. DART. How much did I pay out for labor?

The CHAIRMAN. How much did you pay out for any purpose?

Mr. DART. I spent the $400.

The CHAIRMAN. You paid it all out?

Mr. DART. Sure.

The CHAIRMAN. You did not keep any of that for yourself?

Mr. DART. Oh, no, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom did you pay it?

Mr. DART. I could not tell you all the names. The biggest payment—

The CHAIRMAN. It will be necessary for you to account for that $400—

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. He was going on to say "the biggest payment," and something else, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; I heard him say it. I am instructing him as to what I want him to answer.

Mr. DART. I did not keep a memorandum of it at all. I know the biggest payment I made was a payment of $50 to a man.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom was that paid?

Mr. DART. His name is Frank Field.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose did you give him that $50?

Mr. DART. To go up through the edge of Adams County and through the town of Douglas.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you spend portions of this money in saloons?

Mr. DART. Very little of it.

The CHAIRMAN. I read from your testimony, page 4489:

"Q. What did you do with it?—A. Spent it."

"Q. How?—A. Every old way."

"Q. What is that?—A. Every way."

"Q. Tell us some way that you spent it?—A. Oh, I spent quite a lot of it in saloons."

Mr. HEYBURN. I hope the Senator has made it quite plain that that has reference, up to where he has just read, to the testimony before the State committee. There was nothing to indicate where that quit and where our testimony commenced.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is true. I will hereafter make that distinction.

Is that true?

Is the question asked by the chairman about the testimony before the legislative committee?

Mr. HEYBURN. The chairman of the subcommittee of the United States Senate.

Mr. BRISTOW. The chairman of the subcommittee.

Is that true?

Mr. DART. Well, I should not go past any of them, if there was anybody there I wanted to see.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that statement true?

Mr. DART. I could not say just how much—

The CHAIRMAN. I am not asking you how much. I am asking you if the statement which I have read to you from your former testimony is true. Do you say, now, that that statement is true?

Mr. DART. Yes; that is true. I spent some in saloons.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the answer, then. I proceed to read further from your testimony:

"Q. Do you know how much?—A. Spent quite a lot of it for putting up literature and all that. Every place I went to I spent money, extra."

You put up some literature, did you?

Mr. DART. No; I did not put up any literature myself.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you pay others for putting up literature?

Mr. DART. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what you meant in the answer, is it?

Mr. DART. I suppose so.

The CHAIRMAN (reading):

"Q. Did you make any payments to individuals?—A. Oh, yes; I gave them quite a little bunch of money."

Who were the persons to whom you gave "quite a little bunch of money"?

Mr. DART. Oh, I do not know; I could not mention half or a quarter of them.

The CHAIRMAN. You have told us about Field.

Mr. DART. A man by the name of Williamson.

The CHAIRMAN. How much did you give Williamson?

Mr. DART. I think I gave him $10.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose?

Mr. DART. To go to see people around where he lived, in the town of Buffalo and Pewaukee.

The CHAIRMAN. Name some other person.

Mr. DART. And Carter.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was Carter?

Mr. DART. Carter is a farmer; Johnny Carter. He lives in the town of Buffalo.

The CHAIRMAN. How much did you give him?

Mr. DART. Either $5 or $10.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose did you give him this money?

Mr. DART. To go to see quite a bunch of the fellows over there, and to take his team and fetch them in on the primary day.

The CHAIRMAN. Name another man.

Mr. DART. Quite a few around Westfield, around in there. Taggets was one.

I think it was $5.

When he was testifying to paying some money to men whose names he could not remember, Dart was questioned by Senator POMERENE as follows (p. 980):

Senator POMERENE. Give the names of any of them.

Mr. DART. Albert Frank.

Senator POMERENE. How much did you pay him?

Mr. DART. I think I paid for a box of cigars and gave him either $3 or $5.

Senator POMERENE. Anyone else?

Mr. DART. There was a miller there.

Senator POMERENE. Before going to that, tell me for what you employed Frank.

Mr. DART. Frank was going to send out word to his brothers to come, be sure to have them come in to the primary.

Senator POMERENE. You paid him $3 or $5 for that?

Mr. DART. I paid him about $2, I think.

Senator POMERENE. You paid him $2 for that?

Mr. DART. Yes; and I bought a box of cigars to leave there so that he could give the boys a cigar when they came in.

Senator POMERENE. In addition to that, if I understand you correctly, you paid him $3 or $5, and now you say $2.

Senator POMERENE. Whom else did you employ?

Mr. DART. A man that runs a sawmill there. His name is Lee, I think—oh, no; Smith.

Senator POMERENE. What is his first name?

Mr. DART. Theodore Smith.

Senator POMERENE. How much did you pay him?

Mr. DART. I think $5.

Senator POMERENE. For what was that?

Mr. DART. That was to do what he could on primary day.

Senator POMERENE. That is, to get in voters and talk up Stephenson sentiment?

Mr. DART. Talk it over; yes.

Senator POMERENE. Anybody else?

Mr. DART. There is one saloon keeper there. His name is Otto Giesco. I think I paid for a box of cigars there.

Senator POMERENE. Anybody else?

Mr. DART. Over in Crystal Lake; I can not remember their names, but I paid two or three different men there.

Senator POMERENE. How much?

Mr. DART. $3 and $5, each one of them.

Senator POMERENE. The rate was from $3 to $5?

Mr. DART. Using their teams, you know, and bringing voters in. That is what I paid the most of them.

Senator POMERENE. Anyone else?

Mr. DART. Over to Neshkoro.

Senator POMERENE. Whom did you employ there?

Mr. DART. A liveryman.

Senator POMERENE. What was his name?

Mr. DART. His name was Scovey. There are two brothers of them in the livery business.

Senator POMERENE. How much did you give them?

Mr. DART. I think I gave these fellows $10.

Senator POMERENE. Did you employ anyone else?

Mr. DART. I went from there over to Red Granite and saw a lot of them up in Waushara County—quite a bunch. There are a lot of quarries up in there, and I stopped at all the quarries and—

Senator POMERENE. Whom did you employ?

Mr. DART. I do not know their names, all of them.

Senator POMERENE. How many?

Mr. DART. Probably three or four at each quarry.

Senator POMERENE. What did you pay them?

Mr. DART. $3 to $5—$3 or $5; I do not know which.

Now, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this man Dart is spending the money which Edmonds sent him by check. He made no accounting to Edmonds, and from testimony that I have read preceding this it clearly appears that Mr. Edmonds did not want any accounts rendered; and from this testimony you can readily see why he did not want these accounts. This testimony of Dart's is very illuminating, as it traces this money from Senator STEPHENSON, through Edmonds, his campaign manager, by the way of Dart, to the "ultimate consumer" in the rock quarries.

At about this time Mr. Littlefield began to take part in the interrogatories. On page 982 he said:

Go right ahead and give us the names of all that you can now remember.

Mr. DART. There were a few down in the town of Megan. There was John Wagner, I gave him $5; and a fellow by the name of Bill Ming, and Louis Zellmer.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. How much, if you remember?

Mr. DART. Those fellows—either from $2 to $5.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Go right along.

Mr. DART. There were certainly more than that, but I can not think of them. There is one man out in the township of Montello whose name is Callahan; I gave him $5.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Do you remember Scovey brothers?

Mr. DART. I gave that—Andrew Scovey.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Do you remember any others now?

Mr. DART. No; not now.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. State whether the men that you employed in that way were or were not friends of Senator STEPHENSON.

Mr. DART. You bet they were, or else they would not have got anything.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. When you were on this trip, were you using a carriage or an automobile?

Mr. DART. No; I had a team.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Did you have a team of your own?

Mr. DART. Yes; I had my own team; that I charged up to the State; and when I drove any nights, I paid that out of Stephenson money.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. During any part of this time were you discharging any of your duties as game warden also?

Mr. DART. All the time; every day.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What were you doing as game warden during this time?

Mr. DART. I forget just what the complaints were, but I was out on some complaints, protecting the game.

I think that the conclusion is entirely justifiable that instead of being out protecting the game, Dart was out hunting the game—searching the rock quarries in the region and paying from $2 to $5 for votes for STEPHENSON. Yet we are told by a majority of the investigating committee that there was no corruption used in the election of Mr. STEPHENSON to the United States Senate.

I have quoted largely from the testimony of these men because I want to present to the Senate the story as it comes from the supporters of Senator STEPHENSON.

H. A. BOWMAN.

We will now take up the testimony of Mr. H. A. Bowman, to whom Stone says he paid $1,250 or $1,280. On page 984 will be found the following interrogatories:

The CHAIRMAN. Did you receive any money from Senator STEPHENSON's campaign managers during the time that you were supporting him?

Mr. BOWMAN. I received $150 from the headquarters in Milwaukee and $1,250 from J. W. Stone.

It seems there were a number of these deputy game wardens who were not satisfied with the amount Stone gave them out of his $2,849, and evidently in order to encourage them to greater activity or to satisfy their greed and avarice the headquarters gave them a supplementary amount.

The CHAIRMAN. You received $150 about the middle of August?

Mr. BOWMAN. I think it was all received about that time; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What did you do with the $150 that you received from Mr. Edmonds out of the Stephenson campaign fund?

Mr. BOWMAN. I think that was given to Robert Clark.

The CHAIRMAN. All of it?

Mr. BOWMAN. I think so; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was Robert Clark?

Mr. BOWMAN. I am not sure whether he was a game warden at that time or whether he quit shortly before that.

There were a number of these men employed who were not then game wardens who had previously been game wardens.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Please give us the address of Robert Clark.

Mr. BOWMAN. Palmyra at that time, but I think he is now in Fort Atkinson.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Is that in Wisconsin?

Mr. BOWMAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose did you give it to Clark?

Mr. BOWMAN. To use in the interest of Senator STEPHENSON's primary campaign.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you instructed by Edmonds or anyone to give it to Clark?

Mr. BOWMAN. No; I do not think I was really instructed by Edmonds.

The CHAIRMAN. Why did you turn it over to Clark?

Mr. BOWMAN. I had a talk with Mr. Edmonds about Jefferson County. He asked me if I knew any good worker in Jefferson County, and I think I remember mentioning the name of Mr. Clark.

The CHAIRMAN. Then he really gave you the money to be paid to Mr. Clark, did he?

Mr. BOWMAN. That is the way I took it; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You received from Mr. Stone $1,250. That was about the same time, was it not?

Mr. BOWMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator from Kansas inadvertently omitted the question and answer at the top of page 985.

Mr. BRISTOW. I have put some stars here because I did not want to quote all the details, but everything that I do quote is complete within itself. I am not reading the entire testimony, but I show by stars where it is not complete.

Mr. HEYBURN. The question was by the chairman—So that you had nothing to do with the expending of that money? To which Mr. Bowman replied—Nothing at all.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes. I think that will appear as I go on. It is covered.

The CHAIRMAN. What did you do with the $1,250 received from Mr. Stone, or any part of it? Account for it.

Mr. BOWMAN. $125 was paid to E. W. Tuttle.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose?

Mr. BOWMAN. In the interest of Mr. STEPHENSON's primary campaign.

The CHAIRMAN. Where?

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Tuttle resides at Oconomowoc.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you give him any instructions as to how the money was to be used?

Mr. BOWMAN. No; I gave him no instructions. I had a general talk with him, in which I suggested—as a suggestion on my part—that it be used in keeping up the Stephenson literature, making lists of the voters that were Stephenson supporters, and seeing that the people were at the polls on primary day—that the voters on these lists got out.

Then I omit some of the testimony and proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. What is his business?

Mr. BOWMAN. He was a game warden.

The CHAIRMAN. He was a deputy game warden also?

Mr. BOWMAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What further sums did you pay out of that $1,250?

Mr. BOWMAN. $300 to Edwin Bissonette.

The CHAIRMAN. Where does he live?

Mr. BOWMAN. Milwaukee.

The CHAIRMAN. What is his business?

Mr. BOWMAN. He is with the General Fire Extinguisher Co.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose did you pay him that money?

Mr. BOWMAN. The same as Mr. Tuttle; to use in the interest of Mr. STEPHENSON's primary campaign.

The CHAIRMAN. In what way?

Mr. BOWMAN. I had the same talk with him that I had with Mr. Tuttle.

The CHAIRMAN. * * * Was he to pay out any part of the money that you gave him?

Mr. BOWMAN. Not that I know of; no, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That was for his own services?

Mr. BOWMAN. Yes, sir. He was to use it as he saw fit.

The CHAIRMAN. He might keep it all for his own use?

Mr. BOWMAN. There was nothing said by me as to how he should spend it in paying it out to others.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever have any talk with him as to what he had done with that money?

Mr. BOWMAN. No, sir. I do not know what he did with it.

The CHAIRMAN. He never rendered an account?

Mr. BOWMAN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Proceed and give the name of any other person to whom you paid any part of it.

Mr. BOWMAN. C. W. Johnson.

The CHAIRMAN. How much did you pay him?

Mr. BOWMAN. Fifty dollars.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Give his address, Mr. Bowman.

Mr. BOWMAN. Oshkosh.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose?

Mr. BOWMAN. To use it in the interest of Senator STEPHENSON's primary campaign.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I think, inasmuch as the Senator is omitting considerable parts of his testimony, in fairness it should be indicated.

Mr. BRISTOW. It is indicated in the manuscript and will appear in the RECORD.

Mr. HEYBURN. It requires a comparison. I have been following the Senator.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator desires, I will indicate where I am omitting as I proceed.

Mr. HEYBURN. That will enable those who take up the Senator's remarks for consideration to see what was omitted.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes. It will appear in the RECORD. The manuscript shows just where there is an omission, and I will state it orally if the Senator desires it. I will say that it would have become entirely too voluminous to have covered the entire testimony, but every part to which I refer is a complete story. It is here exactly as it will appear in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will suspend for a moment. The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3812) to regulate public utilities in the District of Columbia and to confer upon the Commissioners of the District of Columbia the duties and powers of a public utilities commission.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it will be so ordered. The Senator from Kansas will proceed.

Mr. HEYBURN. I had reference to such testimony as refers to the expenditure of money in saloons. One of the omissions, one part of the testimony passed over, was where this witness testified that the money was not expended in saloons, and the man was not a saloon campaigner. I merely make that suggestion so as to let it appear that it does not follow, because the Senator does not read the testimony, that there is not testimony here that would be favorable to the other side of the question.

Mr. BRISTOW. In quoting this testimony I have stated what he did spend it for, according to the testimony, and of course the fact that he says he did not spend it in saloons follows. Of course, if he had spent it in saloons, that would have appeared. It does appear in the part I quoted what he says the money was spent for, so there could be no misconception.

Mr. HEYBURN. He says it was not spent in saloons.

Mr. BRISTOW. It was not. It was spent for these other purposes which are narrated.

The CHAIRMAN. Was he to pay it out or to keep it for his own services?

Mr. BOWMAN. I do not think I had any talk with Mr. Johnson as to whether he should keep it or—

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what he did with it?

Mr. BOWMAN. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. Did he ever render any account of it?

Mr. BOWMAN. He did not.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you name some one else to whom you paid a part of that $1,250?

Mr. BOWMAN. C. E. Hitchon.

The CHAIRMAN. How much did you pay him?

Mr. BOWMAN. $450.

The CHAIRMAN. Where does he live?

Mr. BOWMAN. At Marinette.

The CHAIRMAN. What does he do?

Mr. BOWMAN. He keeps a hotel.

The CHAIRMAN. What hotel?

Mr. BOWMAN. I do not know what the name of the hotel is.

The CHAIRMAN. Marinette is the home of Senator STEPHENSON?

Mr. BOWMAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever have an account from him as to the manner in which he expended that money?

Mr. BOWMAN. I did not.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not know how he expended it?

Mr. BOWMAN. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. What instructions did you give him when you gave him the money?

Mr. BOWMAN. I did not give him any instructions. I had the same talk with him that I did with the rest of the fellows.

Bowman then proceeded to submit names of others to whom he paid smaller amounts, leaving a surplus of between $200 and $300 in his hands for which he never accounted and, of course, for which he never was expected to account. This money was paid to the game wardens by Edmonds, some of it through Stone and some of it direct, to purchase their influence in behalf of Senator STEPHENSON in the primary campaign; and it was left to their honor—that is, the traditional honor that is said to exist among thieves—to use this money as effectively as they could to accomplish the desired result—to secure votes in the primary for Senator STEPHENSON.

The item of $450 paid to Hitchon, a hotel keeper in Senator STEPHENSON'S home town—

Mr. REED. Has the Senator disposed of the game wardens?

Mr. BRISTOW. Not quite.

Mr. REED. I wanted to inquire at the appropriate time how many game wardens there were and how many Senator STEPHENSON secured.

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not know. There are 12 or 15 who seem from the testimony to have been employed, but I think there were probably a good many more than that. How many of them received money I do not know. One, Stone claimed, he paid some money to, but he denied he received the money from Stone. I do not remember just what his name was. I will speak of that later on.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it would seem fair to state that Stone confessed that he had committed perjury in regard to the payment.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; I think Stone was a great liar. Why he lied, whether to save himself from criminal prosecution for improperly using this money, or whether he lied in order to deceive Senator STEPHENSON is a matter of conjecture.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was clearly shown that he made the statement to defend himself against accounting for the money. He made statements that he had paid it to men who came forward and swore he had not paid them any money. Mr. Stone found himself in that position, and the committee left him there.

Mr. BRISTOW. As I understand it, he had a meeting of a number of game wardens, and he said, "I have got to account for this money some way, and I want you fellows to admit that you got so much." Some of them did, and one fellow refused and told the story about how it was and showed how it was. To my mind the whole business is saturated with rottenness.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was what was termed "a frame up," where some of these game wardens were called to Mr. Stone's house in the nighttime and asked to concede it to be a fact that he had paid the money, because he had sworn that he had paid them the money.

Mr. BRISTOW. Before the committee of the legislature.

Mr. HEYBURN. He sought to fortify that sworn statement by procuring these men to admit they had received the money. More than one of them notified him that they would not be used in that way, and Stone stood properly charged with perjury and was not inclined after that to be so aggressive.

Mr. BRISTOW. I think there is no doubt that Stone and Perrin and Riordan and a lot of these men perjured themselves as to what they did with the money that was given them. As I have said, whether they perjured themselves in order to avoid disclosures that would have been more embarrassing than to lie about it and tried to frame up an excuse, or whether they did it in order to deceive STEPHENSON, who expected them to use it, or whether it was given to them to subsidize them and purchase their influence and induce them to work and exert what influence they had through the State in STEPHENSON'S behalf, and they felt they had to account for it or admit they had sold out in this political campaign, and rather than admit that they had sold out they thought they would frame up some kind of a lie to tell to the committee—all these reasons for accounting for the expenditure of this enormous amount of money among the people of Wisconsin in that election of course are mere matters of conjecture, but to my mind it makes no difference as far as the merits of its bearing on this case go. In my judgment the enormous expenditure of money given to men as it was to these men is the corrupt use of money in an election, and I do not see how the Senate is going to escape that conclusion.

I am simply going over the details here to show what these men say they did with the money. The patent, indisputable fact is that they got the money to work for STEPHENSON. That is admitted by STEPHENSON and his managers, and the men themselves admit that they got it. If they violated in the disbursement of this fund throughout the State the laws of Wisconsin, and might be indicted for it, or if they were expected by STEPHENSON'S managers to spend it and did not, but kept it instead, or whether they received it simply as a bribe or a corruption fund to induce them to talk for STEPHENSON, and to create Stephenson sentiment, an expression that is used so much, is only an incident.

The item of $450 paid to Hitchon, a hotel keeper in Senator STEPHENSON'S home town, attracted the attention of Senator POMERENE, who asked (p. 939):

Mr. Bowman, why was it that you gave this sum of $450 to Mr. Hitchon?

Mr. BOWMAN. I had a talk with Mr. Hitchon, and I thought he was in a position to do some good work.

Senator POMERENE. He was a brother of one of the game wardens?

Mr. BOWMAN. Yes, sir.

Senator POMERENE. And Mr. Hitchon lived in Senator STEPHENSON'S own home?

Mr. BOWMAN. Yes, sir.

Senator POMERENE. You went into Senator STEPHENSON'S own home county and placed $450 there?

Mr. BOWMAN. I did.

Senator POMERENE. What was that for?

Mr. BOWMAN. I had a talk with Mr. Hitchon; I thought he was in a position to do Mr. STEPHENSON some good in the northern part of Marinette County and De Forest and Florence.

Senator POMERENE. What was his business?

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Hitchon's?

Senator POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. BOWMAN. The hotel business.

Senator POMERENE. And the saloon business?

Mr. BOWMAN. Yes.

Senator POMERENE. How was he to use this $400?

Mr. BOWMAN. To see that the Stephenson literature was kept up and to get people to make lists of Stephenson supporters and for men at the polls on primary day.

Senator POMERENE. Did it not occur to you that Mr. STEPHENSON and his home friends could look after their own county?

Mr. BOWMAN. No; I did not think anything about it.

Senator POMERENE. You paid $450 to one man, $125 to another, $300 to another, $100 to another, $50 to another, and $20 to another, and you received no accounts for any of these sums?

Mr. BOWMAN. I did not.

Senator POMERENE. And you never asked for them?

Mr. BOWMAN. No, sir.

Senator POMERENE. During the time that you were campaigning you were on duty as game warden and receiving a compensation?

Mr. BOWMAN. I was; yes, sir.

Senator POMERENE. A compensation of $2.50 a day and your expenses?

Mr. BOWMAN. $3.50.

Senator POMERENE. And expenses. During that campaign what did your expenses amount to?

Mr. BOWMAN. I do not remember.

Senator POMERENE. What expenses did you charge up to the State?

Mr. BOWMAN. My actual expenses that I thought should be charged up to the State.

Senator POMERENE. What were they?

Mr. BOWMAN. Mileage and hotel bills.

Senator POMERENE. You did not charge any mileage to the Stephenson account?

Mr. BOWMAN. No; I did not.

Senator POMERENE. Nor any of the meals?

Mr. BOWMAN. I did not.

Senator POMERENE. Did you have any livery hire at any time?

Mr. BOWMAN. I did.

Senator POMERENE. Did you charge that up to the Stephenson account?

Mr. BOWMAN. I did not.

From the testimony, it clearly appears that this man Bowman was an official crook and a political blackleg—a fit man to be associated with the Stephenson campaign, under the generalship of Edmonds, Sacket & Co. But I call the attention of the Senate now to a deputy game warden of a somewhat different type.

A. I. HULBERT.

A. I. Hulbert was a resident of Barron, Wis., and was a deputy game warden. On page 953 of the testimony, he was asked by the chairman:

Did you receive any money from Mr. Edmonds during that campaign?

Mr. HULBERT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose?

Mr. HULBERT. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. How did it come to you?

Mr. HULBERT. I can explain it to you, maybe.

The CHAIRMAN. Suppose you do.

Mr. HULBERT. When the campaign first started out I got a letter from Mr. Edmonds, I think, asking me to take charge of Barron County. I told him I could not do it; that I had all the work I could do, and was under civil service and could not do it. It went on from that time down until, I think it was, the 29th of August. Mr. Porter later on took charge of Barron County.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What name is that?

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Warren Porter. I met him at Cameron. He is an old soldier and was going to the soldiers' reunion. He said he had Barron County fixed up all right, with the exception of the city of Barron. He wanted to know of me if I would not pay certain parties that he had spoken to some money to look after the polls in the city of Barron. He wanted to know if I would not do that for Uncle Ike. That is the way he mentioned it. I told him I had kept out of it so far, and I did not want to be mixed in it. He said, "Will you do it for me?" and I said I would. So I paid different parties there a small sum of money out of my own pocket, which I was to receive from Mr. Porter when he got back. I did not expect any money. He went to Milwaukee.

Senator POMERENE. Whom do you mean by "he"?

Mr. HULBERT. Warren Porter. He went to Milwaukee; and the next day or so, or maybe two days afterwards, the check came from Mr. Edmonds. Whether he sent that or not I could not state.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Whether who sent it?
 Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Porter.
 Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Oh! Whether Mr. Porter had the $100 sent to you, you can not tell?
 Mr. HULBERT. No. I got that check, and that is the way I got it. I can not explain it any other way than that.
 Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Go right on and state the parties to whom you paid the sums and the amounts. There is no objection to that I suppose.
 Mr. HULBERT. (referring to memorandum book). It is rather dim. I wrote it with a pencil. I took it down at the time I paid each one. You see I expected to get my money from Warren Porter. I paid E. W. Pierce $5 and $2.50. The $5 was for working at the polls, as I understood it, and the $2.50 was for posting bills. He is a billposter and did some posting of bills. I do not know just what it was. I paid John Webster $3.
 Mr. LITTLEFIELD. For what? Give the names and the amounts. State for what the money was paid.
 Mr. HULBERT. I could not tell you what it was for. Warren Porter told me who to pay.
 Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Oh! You were paying out these sums at the request of Mr. Porter?
 Mr. HULBERT. Yes.
 Mr. LITTLEFIELD. By virtue of an arrangement that had previously been made by him?
 Mr. HULBERT. I met him at Cameron. He was going away and said he had not done it.
 Mr. LITTLEFIELD. He gave you these names and requested you to hand the men these different sums?
 Mr. HULBERT. He did not tell me how much. He said to give them what they asked, but not to give over $5 to any one of them.
 Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Go right along.
 Mr. HULBERT. Tom Case, $2; Charles Wyckoff, $1; John Timblin, $2.
 Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Give their residences.
 Mr. HULBERT. All in the city of Barron. I paid "Chuck" Post $3. He lives a mile and a half from Barron, in the town of Barron. He was to look after the polls, as I understood it. They held their caucus in the city in a hall, and he was to look after the polls there. That is what I understood from Porter. I paid Charles Miller $3. He lives about 9 miles from Barron in a town there. I did not pay that until three or four weeks, probably a month, or maybe two months afterwards. I do not remember. I paid it later on. I phoned him. He told me to phone him, and I phoned him with regard to it. Charles Williams I gave 50 cents. Williams was a man that drove a team; that is, he drove a team to haul voters to the polls. I paid all but the men that drove the teams before I received any money at all, before I knew I was going to get any money or had any idea of it.
 Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Have you finished the list?
 Mr. HULBERT. Yes, sir.
 Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What does it aggregate?
 Mr. HULBERT. $24.50.
 Senator POMERENE. What is that amount?
 Mr. HULBERT. $24.50.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you receive a check in an envelope from Mr. Edmonds?
 Mr. HULBERT. Yes, sir.
 The CHAIRMAN. Without any letter accompanying it at all?
 Mr. HULBERT. There was a letter in with it.
 The CHAIRMAN. What did you do with the letter?
 Mr. HULBERT. I think I burned it up later on.
 The CHAIRMAN. Do you remember the contents of the letter?
 Mr. HULBERT. As near as I can remember, I think the letter said: "I am this day mailing you a present which should have been mailed before, but was overlooked."
 The CHAIRMAN. Was that before or after the primary election?
 Mr. HULBERT. I think I got that either on the 31st or on the 1st. That is as near as I can remember.
 The CHAIRMAN. You got it either the day before the primary election or on that day?
 Mr. HULBERT. Yes, sir; I do not know which. I would not want to swear to that.
 The CHAIRMAN. Did you expend that in the interest of Senator STEPHENSON?
 Mr. HULBERT. No, sir; I did not.
 The CHAIRMAN. In whose interest did you spend it?
 Mr. HULBERT. I used that for myself; I kept it.
 The CHAIRMAN. You kept the $100?
 Mr. HULBERT. Yes, sir.
 The CHAIRMAN. You did not pay out any of it at all?
 Mr. HULBERT. I paid out my own money, and that is the way I was reimbursed.
 The CHAIRMAN. Disregard the identity of the money. Did you pay out any money of your own in the interest of Senator STEPHENSON?
 Mr. HULBERT. Yes, sir.
 The CHAIRMAN. When did you pay it out?
 Mr. HULBERT. I paid it out, as I say, all but for the boys that drove the teams, before I got this money from Mr. Edmonds.
 The CHAIRMAN. How much, altogether, did you pay out before you got this $100 from Edmonds?
 Mr. HULBERT. I would not state certainly whether I saw Mr. Post before that or not. He lives up in the country.
 The CHAIRMAN. Assume that you did. How much did you pay out?
 Mr. HULBERT. About $3.50, as near as I can remember.
 The CHAIRMAN. Altogether?
 Mr. HULBERT. Yes, sir.
 The CHAIRMAN. $3.50?
 Mr. HULBERT. Yes, sir; that is, if I paid Mr. Post before.
 The CHAIRMAN. What was the amount paid Mr. Post?
 Mr. HULBERT. $3. That would make $6.50, if I paid him after I got the money.
 The CHAIRMAN. So that this $100 more than reimbursed you for the money that you had paid out?
 Mr. HULBERT. Yes, sir.
 The CHAIRMAN. You had paid that money out in the interest of Senator STEPHENSON's campaign, had you not?
 Mr. HULBERT. I understood I was to pay that out for Mr. Porter, and that Mr. Porter was to pay me. I took it down here—
 The CHAIRMAN. I mean, were you working for Senator STEPHENSON's nomination?
 Mr. HULBERT. No, sir.
 The CHAIRMAN. Were you friendly to Senator STEPHENSON?
 Mr. HULBERT. Yes, sir; I was.
 The CHAIRMAN. You were not working against him, were you?
 Mr. HULBERT. No, sir; I was not.

The CHAIRMAN. Whatever you did was friendly to him?
 Mr. HULBERT. Yes, sir.
 The CHAIRMAN. When you received the $100 you kept it and counted it a present, did you?
 Mr. HULBERT. I kept it; I did not know what else to do with it.
 The CHAIRMAN. The reason you have been questioned about this is because the Senate committee, in its report, on page 2247, comments upon you having been paid $100. You are called for the purpose of explaining whether or not you received that to work for Senator STEPHENSON. Were you already working for Senator STEPHENSON?
 Mr. HULBERT. No, sir.
 The CHAIRMAN. Did you commence working for Senator STEPHENSON after you received the $100?
 Mr. HULBERT. Maybe I do not exactly understand; but my understanding of this is that I had not been counted on to work in the campaign for anybody. I did not ask anybody—
 The CHAIRMAN. Whom were you supporting? For whom did you vote?
 Mr. HULBERT. I voted for Senator STEPHENSON.
 The CHAIRMAN. When did you first make up your mind to vote for Senator STEPHENSON?
 Mr. HULBERT. When he first came out.
 The CHAIRMAN. Then you were a friend of Senator STEPHENSON's?
 Mr. HULBERT. Yes, sir.
 The CHAIRMAN. You were not doing any friendly act in the interest of any other man's nomination, were you?
 Mr. HULBERT. No, sir; I was not.
 Senator POMERENE. You spent $24.50 at the request of Porter?
 Mr. HULBERT. Yes, sir; at the request of Warren Porter.
 Senator POMERENE. And then you spent $3 in addition to that?
 Mr. HULBERT. No.
 Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is part of it.
 Senator POMERENE. That is part of it?
 Mr. HULBERT. Yes, sir.
 Senator POMERENE. Were you reimbursed by Porter?
 Mr. HULBERT. No, sir. He did not pay me back at all.
 Senator POMERENE. So, with the $100, you had a balance, then, of $75.50?
 Mr. HULBERT. Yes, sir.
 Senator POMERENE. Which was a present to you?
 Mr. HULBERT. Yes, sir.
 Senator POMERENE. From the time Senator STEPHENSON announced his candidacy you had been working in his behalf?
 Mr. HULBERT. I did not understand it that way.
 Senator POMERENE. Were you? Were you talking in his behalf?
 Mr. HULBERT. I did not talk politics with anybody.
 Senator POMERENE. What did you get this $100 for?
 Mr. HULBERT. That is what I say—I do not know.
 Senator POMERENE. You do not know?
 Mr. HULBERT. No, sir.
 Senator POMERENE. Do you often get presents of that kind?
 Mr. HULBERT. No, sir. It is the first one I ever got, and I am sorry I got that.
 Senator POMERENE. You did go around and employ a number of these men, though?
 Mr. HULBERT. Yes, sir; at the request of Mr. Porter I did that.
 Senator POMERENE. What did you say to them when you employed them?
 Mr. HULBERT. I told them just what Mr. Porter told me. He said that he had gone off in a hurry; he wanted to go to meet some of his company in Milwaukee, and he forgot to pay those bills and wanted me to pay them for him. I told every one of them I was paying those bills for Mr. Porter.
 Senator POMERENE. Was that before or after the primary?
 Mr. HULBERT. That was before the primary.
 Senator POMERENE. How long before?
 Mr. HULBERT. I think it was—well, I met Mr. Porter in Hamburg, 6 miles from home, and he was then on his way to Milwaukee. I think that was on the 29th. I could not swear positively.
 Senator POMERENE. It was near the date of the primary?
 Mr. HULBERT. Yes, sir.
 Senator POMERENE. You never asked Porter for the money afterwards, did you?
 Mr. HULBERT. I spoke to him about it; yes, sir.
 Senator POMERENE. What was said between you?
 Mr. HULBERT. I do not know just exactly what there was said, but I spoke to him about the fact that he never had paid me that money yet, and he asked me if I did not get my pay. I said I got some money, but where it came from I did not know, or what it was for. He said, "If you are paid well enough, if you are satisfied, all right; keep still."
 Senator POMERENE. "If you are satisfied, all right?"
 Mr. HULBERT. "Keep still"; yes.
 Senator POMERENE. "Keep still"?
 Mr. HULBERT. Yes, sir.
 Senator POMERENE. Why did he say that?
 Mr. HULBERT. I do not know, sir.
 Senator POMERENE. When was that said?
 Mr. HULBERT. That might have been a month and it might have been six weeks.
 Senator POMERENE. After the primary?
 Mr. HULBERT. After the primary. As I understood it, as I remember now, he went away on a visit somewhere. He went to the soldiers' reunion.
 Senator POMERENE. This was Edmonds who sent you this check for $100?
 Mr. HULBERT. Yes, sir; as I remember it.
 Senator POMERENE. You had had some talk with him before, had you not?
 Mr. HULBERT. I never had any talk with Mr. Edmonds, any more than he wrote me a letter and asked me to take charge of Barron County.
 Senator POMERENE. And you declined?
 Mr. HULBERT. Yes, sir; I declined. I told him I could not do it.
 Senator POMERENE. And notwithstanding that fact he sent you $100?
 Mr. HULBERT. Yes, sir.
 Senator POMERENE. I wish you would explain to us why he should send you $100.
 Mr. HULBERT. I can not do it, Senator.
 Hulbert's inclination was to be an honest and upright citizen. The laws of his State provide that—
 No officer, agent, clerk, or employee under the government of the State shall, directly or indirectly, solicit or receive or be concerned in any manner in soliciting or receiving any assessment, subscription, or contribution for political service, whether voluntary or involuntary, for any political purpose whatever, from any officer, agent, clerk, or employee of the State.

Mr. Hulbert naturally felt that such statute forbade his accepting any money to work in political campaigns, and so when Edmonds first asked him to take charge of the Stephenson campaign up there he declined. But when his friend, Porter, asked him to pay certain parties some money which Porter had agreed to pay them, but which he could not because it was necessary for him to take a train to fulfill an engagement, Hulbert felt that it was nothing improper for him to accommodate Mr. Porter. And so he paid the money to the parties, as requested, and thereby became involved, somewhat to his chagrin, in the Stephenson campaign financial "propaganda." His weakness, of course, was in retaining the $75.50, to which he thought he had no right and which he believed he should not have taken. But that simply illustrates the demoralizing influence on a community of having political corruptionists searching the country throughout for men who will accept bribes and be influenced and induced to take part in political campaigns for money. The kind of political corruption practiced in this Stephenson campaign is most insidious and dangerous to the welfare of the country. Indeed, I think it is more demoralizing on public morals than open and flagrant bribery in the legislature, such as was practiced in the Lorimer case.

Now I come to the last witness I am going to quote from, and it presents another interesting phase of this Stephenson campaign.

F. J. EPPLING.

So persistent and determined was Edmonds to bring within his net every element of Wisconsin's population that even the ministry did not escape his vigilance, as is shown by the testimony of F. J. Eppling, on page 903:

The CHAIRMAN. * * * Mr. Eppling, where do you reside?
Mr. EPPLING. Sheboygan, Wis.
The CHAIRMAN. What is your occupation?
Mr. EPPLING. I am at the present time in the insurance business, temporarily.
The CHAIRMAN. What is your profession?
Mr. EPPLING. I was a clergyman.
The CHAIRMAN. Were you a clergyman during the summer of 1908?
Mr. EPPLING. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Of what denomination?
Mr. EPPLING. The Lutheran.
The CHAIRMAN. Where were you located at that time?
Mr. EPPLING. Algoma, Wis.
The CHAIRMAN. Did you participate in the campaign of Senator STEPHENSON for the United States Senate in the year 1908?
Mr. EPPLING. I did.

I omit some of the testimony and proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you at that time receive any money from him?
Mr. EPPLING. At the first interview? I did.
The CHAIRMAN. Yes.
Mr. EPPLING. I did.
The CHAIRMAN. How much?
Mr. EPPLING. $75.
The CHAIRMAN. You can not give the date, you say?
Mr. EPPLING. I could not.
The CHAIRMAN. How much altogether did you receive from him?
Mr. EPPLING. $400.
The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose did you receive that money?
Mr. EPPLING. It was for the purpose of covering my expenses in helping to organize the various counties.
The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by the term "organize"?
Mr. EPPLING. To find somebody who is familiar with political work to help to bring out the voters, to properly present the candidate to the people.
The CHAIRMAN. Did you enter upon that work?
Mr. EPPLING. To some extent.
The CHAIRMAN. How long did you engage in it?
Mr. EPPLING. About six weeks.
The CHAIRMAN. During that time you received these sums of money?
Mr. EPPLING. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Did you pay any of that money to other people for working?
Mr. EPPLING. Not at all; not one penny.
The CHAIRMAN. It was all for your services?
Mr. EPPLING. Personal expenses and compensation.
The CHAIRMAN. What class of work did you do?
Mr. EPPLING. I did none at first—it was not my intention to do any work at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Then for what were you to receive the money?
Mr. EPPLING. That is, you must take into view—which will be properly explained later—how I was drawn into this campaign.
The CHAIRMAN. Please answer my question. How were you to expend the money?

Mr. EPPLING. For my personal expenses.
The CHAIRMAN. What were you to do for the money?
Mr. EPPLING. I was to look up certain parties in various counties who could do political work for Mr. STEPHENSON.

The CHAIRMAN. Who were those parties?
Mr. EPPLING. Mr. Werner Pflughoeft, in Taylor County; Dr. Frank, in Clark County; Mr. Bratz, an insurance solicitor, in Washington County; and another son of Mr. Pflughoeft, in Outagamie County.
The CHAIRMAN. Those were the persons that you were to look up. Was any part of this money in the nature of a subscription to the church?

Mr. EPPLING. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. It was all for your personal compensation?

Mr. EPPLING. Positively.

The CHAIRMAN. And for work to be done by you?

Mr. EPPLING. By myself personally.

The CHAIRMAN. Who gave you the money?

Mr. EPPLING. Mr. Edmonds.

It appears also from the testimony, on page 905, that, in addition to this $500 paid this man by Edmonds, STEPHENSON made a contribution of $200 to his church, for which he was given due credit. This contribution was made on the 22d day of August, a little over a week before the primary was held.

But be it said to the credit of the ministry that this man is not now disgracing that high and holy calling. He has found it necessary to engage in the insurance business, doubtless since he has become known to be a boodling politician whose services are for sale in political campaigns.

I might continue for hours to read testimony from other witnesses and participants in this campaign of corruption, but it is unnecessary. It would simply weary the Senate and only fill the Record with additional disgusting details. The evidence which I have presented shows conclusively that Mr. STEPHENSON and his representatives have violated the laws of Wisconsin by paying money to inspectors or judges of election, by hiring officers of the State administration to work in this political campaign, and have employed men to perform political services contrary to the statutes of the State. But, as I said in the beginning, the important features of this case for the Senate to consider is not the violation of the laws of Wisconsin, but the moral turpitude involved in the election itself. The evidence of Dee, Perrin, Riordan, Dresser, Knell, Stone, Ring, Wayland, Dart, Kolb, Bowman, Hulbert, Eppling, and many others shows conclusively that men, in consideration of money received from STEPHENSON and his managers, supported STEPHENSON in the campaign and induced other men, through the use of money, to vote for Mr. STEPHENSON in the primary election. No other conclusion can be drawn from the testimony submitted. And the action of Sacket, the bookkeeper of the campaign, in destroying his records, as shown in his testimony; the efforts of STEPHENSON to evade the investigation by the State authorities; and the sending of the correspondence to Michigan, as shown in the testimony of some of the witnesses, so that it would be out of the reach of the legislative committee when it undertook the investigation, are strongly corroborative evidence showing that Mr. STEPHENSON and his managers knew that they had violated the State law.

It is a disagreeable duty to pass upon the action of the venerable Senator from Wisconsin, for whom no one in this body personally has anything but the most kindly feelings. We are called upon, however, to pass upon the integrity of the Senate and to protect its seats from being made the subject of barter and sale as pieces of political merchandise. If such campaigns as the one conducted in Wisconsin which resulted in the election of Mr. STEPHENSON are to meet the approval of this body, then it will lose the respect of the American people. The Senate can not have the confidence of the people if men immensely rich, with little qualification for the great office of Senator of the United States, but who desire the position as a child wants a toy, are to be permitted to employ political highwaymen as managers and organizers, such as the agents of STEPHENSON were, and then turn over to them vast sums of money to be used in purchasing the support of men, wherever they can be found, who will yield to such inducement.

If this Government is to live, corruption in high places must be made as heinous as treason, for it is in the end more dangerous to the Nation's welfare. For the reasons given I can not support the motion of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, it is rather a late hour to commence the discussion of this case, and I ask the Senator from Idaho if he will not consent to the laying aside of the matter at this time?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I do not think there is any sufficient reason for now laying aside the order of business. It is a question of the highest privilege, and there is considerable time left in which to discuss it this afternoon.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Gardner	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Bourne	Gronna	Nelson	Smoot
Bristow	Heyburn	Overman	Stephenson
Bryan	Johnson, Me.	Page	Swanson
Burnham	Kenyon	Perkins	Warren
Culberson	Kern	Poin Dexter	Wetmore
Curtis	Lodge	Pomerene

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, before the announcement is made, apprehending that there will be no quorum, I should like to give notice—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that nothing is in order except to secure a quorum or to adjourn.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suspend putting the motion made by the Senator from North Carolina until the result of the roll call has been announced.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish to say for my colleague [Mr. CLARK of Wyoming] that he was obliged to return to his home to-day on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call of the roll discloses the presence of 27 Senators—less than a quorum.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I ask that the names of absentees be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho asks that the names of the absentees be called. Without objection, the Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators.

Mr. OVERMAN and Mr. HEYBURN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], who first addressed the Chair, is recognized.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HEYBURN. I rose to make that motion; I was on my feet for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] had first addressed the Chair on the same subject.

Mr. HEYBURN. He could not have the floor until the result of the roll call had been announced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the motion. It is a matter of small importance who makes it when two Senators make the same motion. The question is on agreeing to the motion that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, March 4, 1912, at 2 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 2, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we would draw near to Thee in faith, hope, and love. Realizing our dependence upon Thee for all things temporal and spiritual, we most fervently pray for wisdom to guide and strength to sustain us in all our undertakings which may be in accordance with the laws Thou hast ordained. Help us, we beseech Thee, to pray as we work and work as we pray, lest we discredit our Maker and bring down the temple upon our own heads and thus ignominiously perish in the conflict 'twixt right and wrong. Hear us and make us Thine now and always. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

GEN. SAM HOUSTON.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, March 2 is eventful in the history of Texas. To-day is the seventy-sixth anniversary of the Texas declaration of independence and the one hundred and nineteenth anniversary of the birth of Gen. Sam Houston. [Applause.] I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an address to be delivered to-night before the Legislature of the State of Virginia in presenting to that State, on behalf of Texas, a portrait of Gen. Houston.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a speech to be made by him to-night before the Legislature of Virginia in presenting a portrait of Gen. Sam Houston. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following is the address above referred to:

"MR. PRESIDENT, MR. SPEAKER, GENTLEMEN OF THE VIRGINIA LEGISLATURE, LADIES, AND GENTLEMEN: I am commissioned by the governor of Texas, in behalf of the people of that State, through you to present to the State of Virginia a portrait of Gen. Sam Houston. A native of Virginia, he became the liberator of Texas and the most illustrious character that has ever adorned the eventful history of that great Commonwealth.

"In doing so to-night I want to present Houston as he was, obscuring neither his virtues nor his vices, to feature as best I can before you the real man of flesh and blood, with his frailties and faults as well as his fortitude and constancy, with his bitter passions and narrow prejudices as well as his fervent patriotism and dauntless spirit. It is no easy task to do this.

"Much has been said of him, much has been written of him; much that was false, much that was true. Even at this day, when many men still live who knew him, it is difficult to separate the true from the false. It is true of all people and all ages that really great men undergo a process of idealization in which the furrows are all smoothed away and the angles all rounded out. It is difficult for us to think of Washington as suffering from hunger or thirst, from cold or heat, as ever stumbling into error or perplexed by doubt. We have stripped him of all these human attributes and think of him deciding between right and wrong by intuition and achieving great results and solving great problems by inspiration. For nearly 50 years this process of idealization with respect to Houston has been going on. In addition to that, from the time Houston reached Texas, in the glory of his prime until bent and withered and weary his great spirit answered the call of its Maker, he lived in the very midst of storm and tumult. So intense was his personality that when he engaged in a political contest the people forgot former lines of political division and divided into Houston and anti-Houston factions.

"Men thought of Houston and talked of Houston in terms of the superlative. On the one hand he was an orator of brilliant equipment and unexcelled power and on the other he was an unlettered and untutored clown; on the one side he was a statesman with a keen insight and profound grasp of governmental problems and on the other he was a stupid mountebank and a dangerous demagogue; on one side he was a soldier combining the wisdom of Washington with the daring of Napoleon while on the other his military capacity was denied and his courage questioned. It is with this curious compound of all alleged to be good and all alleged to be bad that we have to deal to-night.

"Samuel Houston was born March 2, 1793, in Rockridge County, Va., a county that was the cradle of many distinguished Virginians and that holds the sacred dust of many of your illustrious dead. He came from strong and sturdy Scotch-Irish stock. His father served with credit as a rifleman in the Revolutionary Army. His mother was of magnificent physique and great force of character, giving confirmation of the truth that behind every great man stands a great woman as his mother. When Sam was 13 years of age his father died, and his mother with her six sons and three daughters moved across the mountains and settled on the Tennessee River in what was then a wilderness and on the very border line of civilization. To the west of them the Indian tribes were their only neighbors. Here a rude cabin was built and the family experienced all the trials and encountered all the privations incident to a life on the frontier.

"When he was about 14 years of age he ran away from home to the Cherokee Indians, with whom he lived for several years as the adopted son of the Cherokee chief. When the War of 1812 came on he enlisted as a private, was desperately wounded at the battle of the Horseshoe Bend, where he first saw Andrew Jackson. After many months of suffering he rejoined the Army and received rapid promotion. He resigned from the Army and studied law; in six months was admitted to the bar; was district attorney. In 1823 he was elected to Congress, and reelected in 1825. During this time he renewed acquaintanceship with Jackson, and from that time until Jackson's death was his friend and devoted follower. In 1827 he was elected governor of Tennessee. In January, 1829, he married, and in a few weeks' time he and his wife separated. Upon Houston were turned all the batteries of scandal and slander, but he made no answer save to testify to the virtuous character of his wife, and never to mortal man did he ever breathe one word as to the cause of the estrangement. He resigned the governorship of Tennessee, and, wounded almost unto death, he left the walks of civilized man and once more took refuge among the Cherokee Indians. In resigning from the governorship he wrote a letter, one paragraph I quote as indicating the character of the man:

"That veneration for public opinion, by which I have measured every act of my official life, has taught me to hold no delegated power which would not daily be renewed by my constituents, could the choice be daily submitted to a sensible expression of their will. And although shielded by a perfect consciousness of undiminished claim to the confidence and support of my fellow citizens, and delicately circumstanced as I am and by my own misfortunes more than the fault or contrivance of anyone, overwhelmed by sudden calamities, it is certainly due to myself and more respectful to the world that I retire from a position which in the public judgment I might seem to occupy by questionable authority.

"He was adopted as a member of the tribe and resumed the dress and habits of a savage. In 1832 he reappeared in Washington, and because of some aspersions cast upon him by a Member of Congress from Ohio named Stanberry, Houston assaulted Stanberry. He was arraigned before the House for a breach of its privileges, and after a trial lasting a month was found guilty and reprimanded. In court he was fined for the assault, but Jackson remitted the fine, remarking that if a few more Members of Congress should be treated the same way they would learn to keep a civil tongue. Houston returned to his Indian home. The troubles between Texas and Mexico were brewing. In 1833 he appeared in Texas to negotiate some treaties with the Indians for Jackson. He was persuaded to remain, was a delegate to the first convention called in that year by the Texas settlers to devise means for the redress of their grievances, was a member of the convention of 1835 that established a provisional government for Texas, and on March 2, 1836, his forty-third birthday, he signed the declaration of Texas independence. He had already been made the commander in chief of the Texas army. On April 21, 1836, he fought the battle of San Jacinto, where Texas independence was gained, and was again badly wounded. In October, 1836, he was inaugurated President of the Republic of Texas. He retired in 1838, and was a member of the Texas congress. In 1840 he married again, and this time most happily. To his wife the imperious will of "Old Sam" bowed, and he became as docile as a child. Under her gentle influence he was rescued from the evils of intemperance, to which he had fallen a victim, and her prayers and Christian example turned his thoughts toward a better life, and he became a member of the church and an humble and devout Christian.

"In 1841 he was again inaugurated as President. When Texas became a part of the United States Houston was elected one of her Senators and continued as such until 1859. In 1857 he was a candidate for governor, suffering the only defeat of his lifetime. In 1859 he was again a candidate with the same opponent and was triumphantly elected; was inaugurated in January, 1860. Houston opposed the secession of Texas, declined to recognize the secession convention, and refusing to appear before it to take the oath of allegiance to the Confederacy, he was deposed from the governorship. He returned to his home in Huntsville, where he died on July 26, 1863, aged 70 years, 4 months, and 24 days.

"Houston's education was limited. He acquired the simplest rudiments of an education during a few months spent in the 'old Field School' in Tennessee, and this, together with a session or two at an academy, constituted the whole of his school experience. He had access to but few books, but these he read and absorbed until they became a part of him. Among these was Pope's translation of the Iliad, which he almost memorized, and to this boy in homespun the forest trees became the heroes of this immortal drama, and the hills about him became the beleaguered walls of Troy. After he became a soldier he read and studied the translation of Cæsar's Commentaries. He derived great pleasure and profit from reading Shakespeare's immortal tragedies and comedies, and during the last 25 years of his life he was a constant student of the Bible, and in many a battle upon the hustings he brought confusion to his opponent by the use of some simple illustration or the quotation of some stately sentence from that Great Book.

"In the usual sense Houston was not educated, but yet in another sense he was. He was a child of nature.

"The color of the ground was in him, the red earth,
The tang and odor of the primal things.

"The rivers and mountains, the forests and prairies, were his teachers, and they confided to him their secrets and revealed to him their mysteries. And then he was tutored in the trying school of human experience. He knew men, knew the savages, knew the daring men of the frontier, knew men who lived amidst all the refinements of civilization, knew all classes, all kinds of men, knew the impulses that guided, knew the motives that controlled, knew what they thought, how they felt, and why they acted; and this knowledge, this wisdom, not gained in colleges or universities or from books, gave him his power, his mastery, and made him a leader among men.

"Houston was a remarkable man not only in his mental and moral attributes but in his physical appearance and characteristics. He stood largely over 6 feet in height, with massive, well-formed head, with piercing gray eyes, and with mouth and nose indicating character. Straight and majestic as an Indian, he was in truth a most perfect specimen of physical manhood. Upon public occasions he was the embodiment of grace and courtliness. Among his intimate friends he was social and agreeable, and in the presence of ladies most deferential and respectful.

"He possessed many eccentricities of manner and dress. Some of these indicated the originality of the man, but there is reason to suspect that many of them were largely assumed, because he had much of the histrionic about him, and in the setting of the stage was always careful to so adjust the scenery as to make himself the observed of all observers. He described himself at the age of 18 as being a 'tall, strapping fellow, dressed in a hunting shirt of flowered calico, with a long queue down my back.'

"Soon after he reached Texas he was a delegate to the first consultation or convention, held in April, 1833, at San Felipe de Austin, to protest to the Mexican Government against the wrongs being inflicted upon the people of Texas, and at this convention he appeared dressed as an Indian. When this fact was reported to old Andrew Jackson, he said that he thanked God that there was one man in Texas who was made by the Almighty and not by the tailor. When Houston lived among the Indians he frequently appeared in all the habiliments of an Indian brave, with a white hunting shirt brilliantly embroidered, yellow leggings, and moccasins elaborately worked with beads, a huge red blanket, and a circlet of turkey feathers around his head.

"Judge Reagan, of blessed memory in Texas, describes Houston as he appeared at a treaty-making council with the Indians as wearing a suit of purple velvet, embossed with figures representing the fox's head and having in his belt a bowie knife of great size. In explanation of why he wore the figured suit, he said that it awed the Indians as a sort of mystery and that the big bowie knife impressed them with the idea that he was a great warrior.

"Here let me say that during all Houston's career as an official, both in Texas and in Washington, he was a consistent friend and defender of the Indian. His great heart went out in sympathy to his brethren of the forest. Hear his lamentation in the Senate:

"As a race they have withered from the land. Their arrows are broken and their springs are dried up; their cabins are in the dust. Their council fire has long since gone out on the shore, and their war cry is fast dying out in the West. Slowly and sadly they climb the mountain and read their doom in the setting sun.

"When Houston was President-elect of the Texas Republic he was the guest of honor at a ball, wearing a ruffled shirt, scarlet cassimere waist, and suit of black silk velvet corded with gold, boots with red tops, and with silver spurs on his heels. When Houston was in the Senate he appeared on the streets of Washington wearing a vast and picturesque sombrero, and in the Senate sometimes in a tiger-skin vest, which is still treasured by his descendants, or in a huge Mexican blanket with a scarlet lining.

"He took but little part in the proceedings of the Senate, speaking but rarely. When he did speak, it was with force and oftentimes with great eloquence and power. He spent a large part of his time in the Senate Chamber whittling with a long, sharp knife, on white pine or cedar sticks, a plentiful supply of which he always carried in his pockets, and grumbling in an audible tone about the speeches there being so long and dry. The same kind of speeches are still delivered there, but nobody whittles. Probably the supply of white pine has been exhausted.

"Houston's attitude toward dueling also excited great interest. While living in Tennessee he fought one duel with Gen. White, severely wounding him. Later, in Arkansas, he was involved in trouble with one of his employees and while both were drunk a duel was fought, but their seconds considerably failed to place any bullets in their weapons, and consequently no damage was done. After Houston went to Texas, although it was out on the frontier where physical courage was greatly esteemed and where men's passions ran riot, and where Houston by his merciless tongue and lofty airs was constantly involving himself in quarrels, he always declined to engage in combats of this kind. It is strangely true, though, that in spite of the fact that many men vented their hatred of Houston by denouncing him as a coward the great mass of the people spurned the insinuation and had faith in his personal courage. Houston was challenged by Lamar, who succeeded him to the Presidency of the Texas Republic; by Commodore Moore, of the Texas Navy; by Albert Sidney Johnston, and by numerous others. There is reason to suspect that in some instances enemies, knowing what his answer would be, availed themselves of an opportunity for self-advertisement by challenging Houston. He was always resourceful enough to waive aside the challenge, often to the discomfort of his would-be antagonist. Once when challenged he replied that he never fought downhill. Again, when challenged because of abusive language toward one who had been his friend, he said: "If a man can not abuse his friends, who in the hell can he abuse?" When he was President he was handed a challenge which he directed his secretary to file and list as No. 14, and sent back word that there were 13 others that must be disposed of first.

"I never stand upon the soil of Virginia that I do not feel that I am treading upon holy ground, because I look upon Virginia as being the very birthplace and cradle of human liberty on this continent. It can not often be said that any one portion of a much larger mass of people was an absolutely essential element in any of the world's great movements, but I think that this can be truthfully said of Virginia in the great movement for American independence. One can well ask where would have been found the tongue to kindle the fires of revolution had it not been for Patrick Henry the Virginian, or where could have been found the pen to frame the immortal Declaration of Independence had it not been for Jefferson the Virginian. It is even more rare to find an instance where any one man was essential in both peace and war in establishing and maintaining the independence of a republic. We can well believe that this was true of Washington, the greatest of all Virginians and all Americans, for without Washington the soldier independence could not have been won, and without Washington the patriot and statesman independence could not have been preserved.

"What was true with reference to Washington and the American Republic was equally true of Houston and the Texas Republic. I believe that I am well within the limits of conservative statement when I say that had there been no Houston there would have been no Texas Republic. He became the commander in chief of the Texas army when the darkest hour of the revolution against Mexico was near at hand. The news had reached Texas that Santa Anna, who had established himself as dictator of Mexico, was approaching with a great army—the flower of the Mexican soldiery. The settlements of Texas were exposed and the Texas forces scattered. Houston's idea was to concentrate the Texas forces and to give early battle to the invader. The Alamo at San Antonio was held by Travis with a few men. Fannin, with 500 men, was at Goliad. Houston ordered both to blow up the forts and to join their forces with his. This order was countermanded by the council and was not obeyed. Had it been the cruel butchery of the 500 brave spirits under Fannin would have been avoided and the story of the Alamo would never have been written.

"In all the history of the world I do not believe there has ever been a more inspiring illustration of human courage and human sacrifice than that displayed at the Texas Alamo. Within its walls were gathered 135 of the choice spirits of the Texas frontier. On February 22—Washington's Birthday—1836, the Mexican forces surrounded the Alamo. Two days later Fannin sent a scout through the Mexican lines bearing an appeal for help. Let me read it so that your hearts may thrill with pride at living in a land capable of producing such a man.

"To the people of Texas and all Americans in the world. Fellow citizens and compatriots:—

"I am besieged by a thousand or more Mexicans under Santa Anna. I have sustained the bombardment and cannonading for 24 hours and have not lost a man. The enemy have demanded a 'surrender at discretion, otherwise the garrison is to be put to the sword if the fort is taken.' I have answered the summons with a cannon shot and our flag still waves proudly from the walls. I shall never surrender or retreat.

"Then I call upon you in the name of liberty, patriotism, and everything dear to the American character to come to our aid with dispatch. The enemy are receiving reinforcements and will, doubtless, in a few days, increase to three or four thousand. Though this call may be neglected, I am determined to sustain myself as long as possible and die like a soldier who never forgets what is due to his own honor and that of his country. Victory or death.

"W. BARRETT TRAVIS,

"Lieutenant Colonel, Commanding.

"This thrilling appeal for help came too late. Houston started to the Alamo, but the end had come. For 14 days the siege continued. Santa Anna displayed the blood-red flag that indicated no quarter. His cannon made breaches in the walls of the Alamo. Early on the morning of the 6th of March the final charge was made—the charge of nearly 3,000 against less than 200. The Texans drove them back once, twice, but they came again. The Texans made their last stand in the church of the Alamo. There was no time to reload, but with clubbed musket they fought until the end. No Texas soldier asked for quarter, and none lived to tell the story of that day's valor. In my judgment the most eloquent tribute ever paid in a single sentence to human heroism is in the line: "Thermopylae had its messenger of defeat, but the Alamo had none."

"When the news of the fall of the Alamo and the massacre of Fannin and his men at Goliad reached Houston's little army a panic ensued. Santa Anna was advancing from San Antonio, burning, killing, sparing none. Houston's men thought of their loved ones, defenseless in the cabins on the prairies and in the forests, and one by one they slipped away to carry their families to places of safety until Houston had but 400 left. Back from the Guadalupe Houston retreated until he reached the Colorado. It was expected that he would resist the triumphant advance of Santa Anna there. Back from the Colorado Houston retreated until he reached the Brazos. On toward the Brazos came Santa Anna. Murmurs of dissatisfaction and discontent began to be heard in Houston's army. Surely, it was thought, Houston would give battle at the Brazos. Back from the Brazos Houston retreated until the San Jacinto was crossed. The murmurings became a storm, his army was almost in revolt against him. On April 19, 1836, he camped on Buffalo Bayou with 780 men. As Houston had expected, Santa Anna had divided his forces, and when the two armies faced each other on the 20th Santa Anna had 1,800 men.

"In reaching what was to be the battlefield, both armies had crossed Vince's bridge, 8 miles away. Back of Houston was Buffalo Bayou, broad and deep. Back of Santa Anna was San Jacinto River and its marshes. The only avenue of escape for either army was Vince's bridge. About noon on the 21st Houston called Deaf Smith, a famous scout, to him and ordered him, with a companion, to get axes, ride to Vince's bridge and to destroy it. He told Deaf Smith that if he desired to be back in time for the battle he would have to come like the wind. At 4 o'clock the single fife in the Texas army began playing a love song, and the order to charge was given. Out across the prairie the little band of 700 swept against the Mexican army of 1,800 behind their barricade.

"Before they reached the Mexican line Deaf Smith rode up and down the line shouting, 'Vince's bridge is destroyed! Vince's bridge is destroyed! Fight for your lives.' At close range the Texans delivered their fire, and with the vengeful, thrilling cry of 'Remember the Alamo! Remember Goliad!' upon their lips, they struck the Mexican line. In 20 minutes the Mexican army, hitherto triumphant, was routed. They found no avenue of retreat. For every Texan who died at the Alamo or at Goliad a Mexican died at San Jacinto. Eight hundred others were taken captive, among them Santa Anna. The battle of San Jacinto ended, and Texas was free.

"But with this victory Houston's work for Texas was not yet done. He was elected the first President of the Republic, and upon him devolved the responsibility of bringing order out of chaos and establishing a government. He undertook and carried on the work with untiring energy and characteristic courage. He organized a government in all its parts. He established a currency system and provided for protecting the obligations of the Republic. He made treaties of friendship with the Indians, established domestic peace and tranquillity, and when he retired from the Presidency in 1839, Texas had been recognized as a Republic and its status established as one of the nations of the world.

"During the next two years all that Houston had done was undone. To the west and north Texas was circled round with the blazing camp fires of hostile Indians, while Mexico was preparing for a new invasion from the south. Not a dollar was in the treasury, the public debt was appalling, and the credit of Texas was gone. As in every other emergency the people turned toward Houston, and he became President again in 1841, and again he responded. In 1845 the annexation of Texas to the United States was finally consummated, and Houston became a Senator from Texas.

"The saddest part of Houston's life was yet to come. Next to Texas, Houston loved the Union most. He had been born amongst the mountains; he had grown to manhood and to old age out upon the frontier line; he had spent many anxious years trying to secure the annexation of Texas to the Federal Union, and he was the protégé and follower of Jackson, who had been the very incarnation of devotion to the Union, and all these influences combined to make Houston resist every movement that in his opinion tended toward disunion. During the service in the Senate he antagonized the people of his State and section by his votes upon questions that affected the relations of the South with other sections of the Union. He retired from the Senate in 1859 and in January, 1860, was inaugurated governor of Texas. In 1860 he came within a few votes of being nominated for the Presidency by the convention that nominated Bell and Everett. As the campaign of 1860 progressed and it became more and more evident that Mr. Lincoln would be elected, the people of the South became agitated as to what their action should be in that contingency, and the movement began that finally resulted in secession. With a moral as well as physical courage that was sublime Houston set himself against this movement in Texas and sought to beat back the rushing tide of sentiment in favor of the dissolution of the Union. With all the fervor of youth this old man campaigned the State, pleading with all the power of his eloquence with the people not to take this step and warning them of the ruin that would follow. In the light of what did follow his utterances now seem to have been those of a prophet. Once when speaking against secession some young ladies in the audience showed signs of disapproval. He paused, looked at them intently, and said:

"It is impossible not to note the marked sign of disapproval on the part of young ladies here. Manifestly they do not appreciate the serious import of the present crisis, but I tell them that before their sweethearts return from the impending war the valleys of the South will run with blood.

"In another speech he said:

"Some of you laugh to scorn the idea of bloodshed as a result of secession and jocularly propose to drink all the blood that will flow in consequence of it, but let me tell you what is coming on the heels of secession. The time will come when your fathers and husbands, your sons and brothers, will be herded together like sheep and cattle at the point of the bayonet and your mothers and wives and sisters and daughters will ask: 'Where are they?'

"Again he is reported as having said that—

"When Texas and the Sunny Southland should be overrun with Federal soldiers, and the best blood of the South spilled upon the battle field, the negro slaves set free, martial law proclaimed in every Southern State and all southern men disfranchised and the negroes given the ballot, then, and only then, would his fellow citizens see that Sam Houston was right in opposing secession and the war.

"Houston did not oppose secession as a principle, because he admitted that for just cause every people had the inherent right of revolution. In a speech made by him before he retired from the Senate, in answer to Senator Seward, he said:

"Whenever one section of this country presumes on its strength for the oppression of the other, then will our Constitution be a mockery, and it would matter not how soon it was severed into a thousand atoms and scattered to the four winds. If the principles are disregarded upon which the annexation of Texas was consummated, there will be for her neither honor nor interest in the Union; if the mighty, in the face of written law, can place with impunity an iron yoke upon the neck of the weak, Texas will be at no loss how to act, or where to go, before the blow aimed at her vitals is inflicted. In a spirit of good faith she entered the Federal fold. By that spirit she will continue to be influenced until it is attempted to make her the victim of Federal wrong. As she will violate no Federal rights, so will she submit to no violation of her rights by Federal authority. The covenant which she entered into must be observed or it will be annulled.

"On March 2, 1861, the twenty-fifth anniversary of Texas independence and the sixty-eighth anniversary of Houston's birth, the secession convention reconvened in the Texas capitol to declare the result of the election, held shortly before, and to take the final step in associating Texas with the Confederacy. When Houston heard the booming of the cannon that announced that this had been done it is said that he bowed his head and wept. It was prescribed that all the officials of the State should appear on a certain day and take the oath of allegiance to the Confederacy. When the day came the name of Sam Houston was called three times, but he did not respond. Below in his office, alone, he sat and whittled.

"Because of his refusal to take the oath he was deposed from the governorship. In a published address he protested against it, but declared that he would make no attempt to retain his office by force. Listen to what he said:

"I love Texas too well to bring civil strife and bloodshed upon her. To avert this calamity I shall make no endeavor to maintain my authority as chief executive of the State, except by the peaceful exercise of my functions. When I can no longer do this I shall calmly withdraw from the scene, leaving the government in the hands of those who have usurped its authority, but still claiming that I am its chief executive. I protest in the name of the people of Texas against all the acts and doings of this convention, and declare them null and void.

"Fellow citizens, think not that I complain at the lot which Providence has now assigned me. It is, perhaps, but meet that my career should close thus. I have seen the patriots and statesmen of my youth, one by one, gathered to their fathers and the government which they had reared rent in twain, and none like them are left to unite it once again. I stand the last, almost, of the race who learned from their lips the lessons of human freedom.

"Although Houston opposed the policy of secession he bowed to the decision of the State and remained loyal to her. He said:

"After following her banner before, when an exile from the land of my fathers, I went back into the Union with the people of Texas. I go out from the Union with them and, though I can see but gloom before me, I shall follow the 'Lone Star' with devotion as of yore.

"He sorrowed that he was too old and feeble to go forth again to battle for Texas, but he gave his son to the armies of the South.

"I can not conceive of a more pathetic scene than that of Houston, bowed with age and broken hearted, driven from the Capitol of Texas. He went to his home at Huntsville and lived in quiet and simple retirement. On March 18, 1862, he made his last public appearance, and the old hero of San Jacinto delivered his last speech. In it he said:

"Ladies and fellow citizens, with feelings of pleasure and friendly greeting I once again stand before this an assemblage of my countrymen. As I behold this large assemblage, who from their homes and daily toil come to greet once again the man who has so often known their kindness and affection, I can feel that even yet I hold a place in their high regard. This manifestation is the highest compliment that can be paid the citizen and patriot. As you have gathered here to listen to the sentiments of my heart, knowing that the days draw nigh unto me when all thoughts of ambition and worldly pride give place to the earnestness of age, I know you will bear with me while with calmness, and without the fervor and eloquence of youth, I express those sentiments which seem natural to my mind in the view of the condition of the country. I have been buffeted by the waves as I have been borne along time's ocean until, shattered and worn, I approach the narrow isthmus which divides it from the sea of eternity beyond. Ere I step forward to journey through the pilgrimage of death I would say that all my thoughts and hopes are with my country. If one impulse rises above another it is for the happiness of these people; the welfare and glory of Texas will be the uppermost thought while the spark of life lingers in this breast.

"In the early days of July, 1863, the Confederacy was rent in twain by the capture of Vicksburg, and many thousand of the very flower of Lee's army went down to death and to glorious immortality on the field of Gettysburg. When the tidings of these great disasters reached Texas, Sam Houston was on his deathbed. Even then his thoughts were still of Texas and the South, and his prayers were for their success. For hours he had been unconscious, but before the end the light of consciousness beamed upon his face. His loved ones bent close above him and caught the words, 'Texas! Texas!' He whispered one more name, that of 'Margaret,' his wife, and then the old soldier was dead.

"Nearly 50 years have passed since Houston died. The great war then raging has long been over and its scars have almost healed. Your State and my State both walked through the valley and shadow of death, but they have felt the quickening touch of a mighty resurrection. From the ashes of their desolation they have risen with their strength renewed and their courage unshaken.

"The dream of Houston has almost been realized. The same flag floats over all and all do honor to it. Texas has ceased to be merely an empire in area. She has become one in fact. Four million happy, contented, and prosperous people live within her borders. Her vast prairies have been converted into fields and her mighty forests have yielded to the dominion of industry. The faces of her people are radiant with hope and their hearts are thrilled at the prospect of victories yet to be. While hoping for a triumphant future, her people glory in a heroic past. The Alamo still stands a cherished shrine; the dead at Goliad still tell the story of how men can die in the holy cause of liberty; the field at San Jacinto is still hallowed as the birthplace of a new republic. The mighty and chivalric dead still live in Texan hearts, and Houston first of all. In loving memory of what he was and what he did we have built above his dust a monument of enduring stone and in the Hall of Fame of our National Capitol we have placed his image in polished marble. Around the firesides in cottage and mansion for all the ages yet to be the story of his deathless deeds will thrill alike the hearts of sire and son, and the mountains which looked down upon his birth will not be more everlasting than his fame.

"We tender you to-night a portrait of this simple but majestic man, this soldier who bled for two Republics, this orator, statesman, and patriot, and we declare to you that the deeds he wrought entitle him to live in our hearts as a great Texan, in yours as a great Virginian, and in the hearts of all mankind as a great American."

AGRICULTURE APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. LAMB, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 18960) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, with Mr. BORLAND in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. On yesterday consideration of the bill had proceeded to line 15, on page 18.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, yesterday afternoon I raised a point of order on a certain part of the bill at line 22, page 17, beginning with the words "one mechanician," down to the word "dollars," in line 2, on page 18.

I want to state, Mr. Chairman, that incorporated in that language is a provision for four mechanicians in the Department of Agriculture. I wanted to ask the gentleman from Virginia to give us some information as to the duties of those mechanicians, and why it was necessary to have so large a number of mechanicians in this department?

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, this appropriation for these mechanicians has been carried in this bill for several years. Their duties are varied. The committee did not deem it either necessary to ask the chief of the division upon this particular point because they took it for granted that these people were necessary in this large bureau of the Department of Agriculture, and we felt and believed that they had been appointed and were doing good service. That is about all the specific reply that I can make in view of the fact that our attention was not called directly to it, and it has been uniformly provided for in previous bills.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Can the gentleman tell me what a mechanic is; what he is supposed to do?

Mr. LAMB. Among other things, he is engaged in making rubber stamps and doing all the mechanical work that is connected with the department, in every shape and form, in which human ingenuity in that line can be employed.

Mr. MANN. Are not some of them employed in connection with the experimental greenhouses?

Mr. LAMB. Yes; that is another thing they do.

Mr. MANN. They have a lot of mechanical work there. I do not know whether they are called mechanics or not.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I understand that, but is it not a fact that people put down here as mechanics are men to look after the automobiles in that department and see that they are kept in order?

Mr. LAMB. No; they were carried on the bill before human ingenuity had devised the automobile.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Granted, but what did they do?

Mr. LAMB. I have endeavored to explain as far as I can. I want to say that we necessarily must trust these men to a degree who are at the head of these bureaus and divisions. We must have faith, my friend, in somebody. Faith is man's best hope here and his only hope beyond. You must have faith to please God; you must have faith to serve men! [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I agree with the gentleman's scriptural ideas, but I would like to know if the gentleman means to tell the House that as chairman of this great committee, neither he nor any member of it has thought it of sufficient importance to interrogate any of the department officials as to the duties or necessity for the employment of these four mechanics. In other words, does the chairman mean to say that although he is chairman of a great committee in this House, composed of a number of Members of this House, that he and the entire committee are willing to accept and do accept in the preparation of a bill carrying over $16,000,000 the simple statement of officials in the department that they are necessary, without going into detail and making any investigation at all?

Mr. LAMB. I have already replied to the gentleman that we trust these people to a degree in planning for employees in the conduct of their business.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. In this case the gentleman did not ask them anything about it?

Mr. LAMB. In this case we failed to ask what the particular work these mechanics did, taking it for granted that unless they had duties to perform they would not be in the department.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the following language—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his point of order?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes. On page 17, line 22, "one mechanic, $1,380; one mechanic, $1,260"; and in line 25, "one mechanic, $960"; and on top of page 18, line 1, "one mechanic, $900."

I want to say to the chairman that if Members of the House are willing to vote to appropriate this money for the salaries of these people upon the statement of the chairman, that he has no knowledge at all of the necessity for them, I am content. I want to say further it is my understanding—I may be misinformed—that this little army of mechanics are maintained in that department for the purpose of looking after the automobiles kept for the use of the officials of that department. I may be in error about that, but we can not get any information from the committee, and therefore I move to strike out that language.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, it is true that the committee did not interrogate Dr. Galloway on this proposition. It is true that the committee did not interrogate Dr. Galloway on a great many clerical positions. It is true that the committee has not sought by personal investigation to find out exactly what every clerk in the Department of Agriculture does. I think there are some 12,000 of these men scattered throughout the United States, and it would be an absolute physical impossibility for any committee of this Congress in the course of a busy session to find out exactly, precisely, according to the Florida rule, what each of these employees does. As the chairman of the committee so well expressed it, we must trust somebody. I am not afraid to trust my fellow man, because I am not afraid for my fellow man to trust me. [Applause.] We can not be expected, as a busy committee, dealing not only with this appropriation bill, which is a small part of the work of the Committee on Agriculture, but dealing with great problems affecting the future of this country, to spend our time in inquiring what each one of these several mechanics is doing. That suggestion is absurd. We take it that the Secretary of Agriculture, operating through his subordinates, is not going to do anything contrary to the wish of Congress. We take it that the Secretary of Agriculture, in this instance working through Dr. Galloway, is not going to permit these fellows to run automobiles at public expense unless it is necessary in the conduct of public business and in connection with the business of the Department of Agriculture, and then he would have the right to do it. It is absolutely impossible for any committee of Congress, to explain all of these little things that occur in a great appropriation bill, and it is strange to me that the activity of the gentleman from Florida has become so acute upon this appropriation bill. The Army appropriation bill went through a few days ago, and I do not recollect that the gentleman from Florida posted himself upon the watch tower to see that none of these things got into the Army appropriation bill. I can not understand why the gentleman from Florida has picked out the agricultural appropriation bill for special attack, when I know that the great State of Florida and its future history are wrapped up in the development of the agriculture of that State, and this department of the Government is doing a great work in the State of Florida and throughout the country in the uplift of the great profession of farming. I therefore trust the amendment of the gentleman will be voted down, voted down promptly and unanimously. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Well, I want to say a word or two. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can ask unanimous consent.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Go ahead; I will get a chance later. The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in the paragraph.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, that amendment is not in order at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Any amendment to this paragraph is in order.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Now, Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say, in reply to the gentleman from South Carolina, that no man is more in favor of this Government making appropriations for the agricultural interests than I am, and liberal appropriations—in fact, more than liberal appropriations—but I am opposed to a bill that comes into this House carrying nearly $17,000,000 for the supposed interest of the agriculture of this country, when probably only two or three million dollars of it goes to the benefit of the farmer. Seventeen million dollars are appropriated here and the great bulk of it is taken up in salaries, in automobiles, in carriages and horses for department officials to use, in these outside trimmings and trappings that never get to the farmer, and in which he is not interested a particle. The gentleman can not put me in the attitude of opposing appropriations for the agricultural interests of this country. I will go as far as he will go, or any other man upon this floor, in appropriating for those things which foster, care for, and build up the agricultural interests of this country. The agricultural interests of the country are the basis upon which all our prosperity is built. [Applause.] The manufacturers, the mercantile establishments, all the rest might go down to disaster and ruin, but if the farmer is prosperous the country will prosper. So I am in favor of liberal appropriations, but I am not willing to take the great bulk of this money to pay law clerks and solicitors and hire automobiles and carriages and mechanics and chauffeurs, and things like that that the farmer would not know when he saw and which he cares absolutely nothing about. That man is the true friend of the farmer who stands upon this floor and insists that the money appropriated for his good shall go to this purpose, shall benefit agriculture and see that it does not keep in the city of Washington a lot of pampered, yellow-shoed, red-necked hair-parted-in-the-middle dudes to ride in automobiles. [Applause.] The fellow wearing brogan shoes and pulling a bell cord over a flop-eared mule is the man I am standing for. [Applause.] Ah, Mr. Chairman, yet the committee comes in here and says on important items that they have made absolutely no investigation at all, and know nothing about it.

I ask these gentlemen now to take out the trimmings, to take out the froth, to take out this honey they are delivering to these dude people, and to give it to the farmer in order to build up the agricultural interests and put a stop to the great crop of dudes who infest and inhabit these departments. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the items which the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] objected to and moved to strike out a few moments ago were for mechanics under the Bureau of Plant Industry, in the item relating to salaries under that bureau.

That bureau represents the most important portion of the Department of Agriculture. It is engaged in obtaining information for the direct benefit not only of the man who drives the flop-eared mule, but for the benefit of the flop-eared mule. And I have no doubt that if the Department of Agriculture can proceed and obtain the necessary information, the use of the single mule in drawing the very small and inadequate plow in the gentleman's district can be dispensed with and modern farming introduced into Florida. [Applause.]

This bureau is engaged, among other of its works, in maintaining an experimental plant-industry greenhouse service. It has various experimental farms. It is studying the subject of many things enumerated in the bill, covering many pages of it, and yet the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] objects to an item which provides men who will keep the mechanical work of this bureau up to date. No wonder the gentleman from Florida objects. He does not believe in keeping the mechanical work either of the bureau or of the farmer up to date. I hope that the time may come when we may introduce modern mechanical appliances into the district of the gentleman from Florida, and if we could provide mechanics to go into his district to teach them how to use modern agricultural mechanical implements it would do a great service to Florida. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

General expenses, Bureau of Plant Industry: For all necessary expenses in the investigation of fruits, fruit trees, grain, cotton, tobacco, vegetables, grasses, forage, drug, medicinal, poisonous, fiber, and other plants and plant industries, in cooperation with other branches of the department, the State experiment stations, and practical farmers, and for the erection of necessary farm buildings: Provided, That the cost of any building erected shall not exceed $1,500; for field and station expenses, including fences, drains, and other farm improvements; for repairs in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; for rent outside of the District of Columbia; and for the employment of all investigators, local and special agents, agricultural explorers, experts, clerks, illustrators, assistants, and all labor and other necessary expenses in the city of Washington and elsewhere required for the investigations, experiments, and demonstrations herein authorized, as follows:

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the language on page 18, beginning with line 21—

For the erection of necessary farm buildings: Provided, That the cost of any building erected shall not exceed $1,500; for field and station expenses, including fences, drains, and other farm improvements—

As being new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida makes the point of order against the portion of the paragraph providing for the erection of necessary farm buildings, provided that the cost of any building erected shall not exceed $1,500.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Florida make the point of order, or does he reserve it?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will reserve it.

Mr. LAMB. Then, Mr. Chairman, let me make the following statement: This provision was put in in order to assist this bureau in the following way. The bureau has no definite authority at the present time to make such improvements in connection with its field stations and experimental farms. It is seriously interfering with the carrying out of the investigations being conducted at such places. Now, on this point I have some letters here, which, perhaps, I will read, if necessary, but I will say that we were a little more careful as to this matter than we were in inquiring about these mechanics. We asked Dr. Galloway, and he said:

Dr. GALLOWAY. That question is an important one to us. We now have established in different parts of the country a number of stations, at which we are doing important work, notably on reservations set aside by the Reclamation Service, and also in connection with our dry-land experimental work in the West. Where these stations have been established it is necessary and essential that we should have authority to erect buildings for the housing of our men and the caring for the machinery and other things used in connection with the work. Heretofore we have been taking care of this matter out of our general expense appropriation, but under a recent ruling of the Treasury Department it is found necessary to get legislation if we expect to take care of it in future.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that makes it very plain that this new language is proper and that it ought to be enacted into law.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "improvements," line 24, page 18, insert the following:

"And provided further, That the money already appropriated for 'general expenses Bureau of Plant Industry, fiscal year 1912,' is hereby made available for the erection of the necessary farm buildings: Provided, The cost of any building erected shall not exceed $1,500, and for field-station expenses, including fences, drains, and other farm improvements."

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order only in order that my friend from South Dakota may be heard on the subject.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. This amendment applies to the current appropriation the same authorization for buildings as the bill now provides for the coming fiscal year. The department has always construed the general authority authorizing this experiment work to include the putting up of temporary buildings and sheds for horses, and fences, and things of that kind, which are necessary for carrying on the experimental work. A few months ago the Comptroller of the Treasury rendered a decision in which he held that specific authority would have to be given. Specific authority is now given in the item just passed, which has been before the committee, for the coming fiscal year. This simply gives the same authority for the present fiscal year over the fund already available.

I may say that there are three or four experiment stations, one or two in the South and one or two in the Northern States, in which the work is now stopped for the purpose of obtaining this authority for the current fiscal year which is now in the bill for the coming fiscal year.

Mr. BUTLER. How much money is to be expended on this particular feature?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I think it does not exceed $4,500, but the current appropriation amounts to about $75,000 in all, most of which goes to the cultivation of the fields.

Mr. BUTLER. If the gentleman's amendment is adopted, how much money will be applied to this work?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. About $4,500, as I understand.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the control of diseases of orchard and other fruits, $40,675.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to that paragraph. I move to strike out "$40,675" and insert in lieu thereof "$42,075."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK].

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 19, line 11, strike out the words "forty thousand six hundred and seventy-five" and insert in lieu thereof the words "forty-two thousand and seventy-five."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Now, Mr. Chairman, $42,075 was the amount carried in the last bill. If there is an important matter under the control of the Bureau of Plant Industry, it is the matter of the control of the diseases of orchard and other fruits, and I do not understand that there is any reason for the diminution of this appropriation.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Florida yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will yield, I will say to the gentleman that there is only an apparent decrease in the appropriation for that item. As a matter of fact, there is no actual decrease. The statement furnished to me by Dr. Galloway himself, who is in charge of the work, is to this effect: The present appropriation is $42,075; the estimate for 1913 is $40,675; the amount allowed by the committee, $40,675. The apparent decrease in that item is due to the transfer of some clerk from one roll to another. I think, with that explanation, the gentleman will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. It is a matter of clerk hire?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. LAMB. Five hundred dollars is for rent.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have a vote on my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the control of diseases of forest and ornamental trees and shrubs, $29,510.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the increase in that appropriation. There is an increase of $4,840. I make a point of order against the language, "$29,510."

Mr. LAMB. That is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. It is an increase.

Mr. MANN. That does not make any difference. It is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The appropriation in the last bill was $24,670. The appropriation in this bill is $29,510. That is an increase of $4,840. I make the point of order against the appropriation.

Mr. LEVER. On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I do not suppose it is necessary to argue to the Chair. The point of order does not lie. The Chairman held that yesterday, and it has been so held by every Chairman of committees from time immemorial—that a point of order does not lie against an increase of an appropriation on an appropriation bill. I hope the Chair will rule.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I would like to have a ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. If the provision is authorized by law, the appropriation may be increased or diminished, in the judgment of the committee or of the House. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Then, Mr. Chairman, I offer to amend by striking out the words "twenty-nine thousand five hundred and ten" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "twenty-four thousand six hundred and seventy dollars."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend on page 19, lines 13 and 14, by striking out the words "twenty-nine thousand five hundred and ten" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "twenty-four thousand six hundred and seventy."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think we have here a beautiful illustration of how the farmer is being taken care of. Here is one item for the control of diseases of orchard and other fruits, which is of the utmost importance to the rural people of this country. They are engaged in the cultivation of orchard and other fruits from Maine to California and from the Great Lakes to the Gulf. Yet here is a proposition to decrease the amount, following it immediately with an increase, when it comes to the appropriation for the control of diseases of forest and ornamental trees and shrubs, that are of no particular benefit to the farmer. They may charm the eye, they may delight the æsthetic tastes of some of these dudes employed in this great Department of Agriculture, but they are of no material benefit to the horny-handed son of toil who is laboring to make a living for himself and support this great Republic.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. HAWLEY. The purpose of this appropriation to control the diseases of forest and ornamental trees is, first, to protect the national forests, and, second, to protect the ornamental trees and shrubs from diseases that will be communicated to orchards and useful fruit-bearing trees. Without this authority we can not protect the orchards from the diseases that accumulate among the ornamental trees and are transmitted to the fruit trees.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman explain the necessity for this increase of nearly $5,000 over the appropriation of last year?

Mr. LAMB. I will explain that.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Just briefly, because I want to say something else on this thing.

Mr. LAMB. Will I be brief if I follow the gentleman's example?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I think we would make time if the gentleman would do that.

Mr. LAMB. In the appropriation under miscellaneous items, further along in this bill, the item for chestnut-tree bark disease, $5,000, has been transferred to this subappropriation. That accounts for that much of it.

The sum of $840 has been transferred to it from the subappropriation for national plant investigation, making $5,840.

This amount has been decreased by $1,000 to cover the transfer of one employee to the statutory roll, making a net increase of $4,840.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Whenever we get down to the facts—

Mr. LAMB. My friend can not take me off my feet.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I have no time to yield for a speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida has the floor.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I have the floor, and I can not yield further.

Mr. LAMB. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I thought the gentleman yielded to me for a brief explanation.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I yielded for a simple statement.

Mr. LAMB. I thought you wanted me to make an explanation.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Whenever we get down to the facts as to these increases and decreases, every single time the "nigger in the woodpile" is some dude clerk whom they are transferring from one place to another and managing to increase his salary all the time. Now, there is not any reason why the appropriation for the protection of fruit trees and orchards should be decreased and the appropriation for the protection of ornamental trees should be increased.

Mr. Chairman, in this country we can not live on beauty. The farmer may feast his eyes upon the beauty of an ornamental tree, but he can not feast his stomach on it. He must have something more substantial than the mere beauty of ornamental trees, and I am here pleading for the man who is dependent on what comes out of the ground for the support of himself and his family. I say he is not being treated fairly in this bill when the appropriations for the admirers of the beautiful are increased and the appropriations for the horny-handed one-gallus fellow who sweats and toils from daylight to dark are being decreased. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to finish my explanation and then, without attempting to answer my friend's apostrophy to the beautiful, I will ask for a vote. The chestnut-tree-bark disease investigation of the department is identical to that in similar projects under the forest pathologists. Furthermore, the chestnut-tree-bark investigations are strictly under the forest pathologists, and therefore it is believed that the two appropriations should be consolidated.

Now, on that point we asked Dr. Galloway, and here is his answer:

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE.

The CHAIRMAN. The next item is for control of diseases of forest and ornamental trees and shrubs, $34,670. Last year it was $29,510. This is an increase.

Dr. GALLOWAY. Last year there was a separate item added to the appropriation act, and it was put over in the back of the bill as a special item, as I explained awhile ago. This year we have taken that and put it in the proper place, and it does not, in fact, represent any increase.

Mr. HAWLEY. The two items of last year equal the one of this year?

Dr. GALLOWAY. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. What was that item?

Dr. GALLOWAY. The item was the investigation of the chestnut-bark disease.

Therefore, this shows that the gentleman from Florida has spent this much of his time unnecessarily, for it is in fact no increase at all.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. LAMB. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is it not a fact that in every transfer from the lump sum to the statutory roll the clerk was transferred at the same salary?

Mr. LAMB. Yes. I am glad the gentleman suggested that. The House directed this thing to be done:

The Secretary of Agriculture for the fiscal year 1912, and annually thereafter, shall transmit to the Secretary of the Treasury for submission to Congress in the Book of Estimates detailed estimates for all executive officers, clerks, and employees below the grade of clerk, indicating the salary or compensation of each, necessary to be employed by the various bureaus, offices, and divisions of the Department of Agriculture.

That is the law, and these transfers do not represent any increase of salary.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For acclimatization and adaptation investigations of cotton, corn, and other crops introduced from tropical regions, and for the improvement of cotton by cultural methods, breeding, and selection, $31,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of inquiring the reason for the reduction in the amount carried by this paragraph.

Mr. LAMB. It has been reduced from $34,670 to $31,000. Two thousand two hundred and ninety dollars was cut by the committee in the interest of economy, and $1,380 covered the transfer of one employee to the statutory roll.

Mr. MANN. What interest of economy is there in reducing the appropriation for the acclimatization and adaptation investigations of cotton, corn, and other crops introduced from tropical regions? I know of nothing more important in the Agricultural Department of the country than that very paragraph.

Mr. LAMB. We were reducing where we could do it without hurting the activities, and we asked Dr. Galloway along this line if they could not stand a reduction of a few thousand dollars on this particular item, and he said if in our wisdom we did it he thought he could get along.

Mr. MANN. Of course; what else could he say?

Mr. LAMB. We were counseling with him and getting his views as an expert and the chief of the bureau having this matter in charge.

Mr. MANN. Here we are making studies as to the adaptation to our climate of various agricultural products, and we have introduced into the country new crops of various kinds, new cereals and new species of cotton plants of great value to the country. I know of nothing that is more important. Of course, if they cut off $2,000 or $30,000, how will that loss be met in the department?

Mr. LEVER. Let me say to the gentleman from Illinois that the subcommittee making up this appropriation bill asked Dr. Galloway to meet with us when we were considering his bureau. We told him the pressure to reduce expenditures was exceedingly strong.

Mr. MANN. I think that is what is the trouble.

Mr. LEVER. And wherever we made a cut we wanted to make it in such a manner and in such a way as to do the least harm. He said, "You can take this appropriation and several more appropriations and reduce them 5 or 6 per cent and in no wise interfere with my work, because we give ourselves a leeway of 5 to 10 per cent in our estimates."

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think that at the present time it is extremely important to continue to the full limit the investigations for the improvement of cotton by cultural methods, breeding, and selection, especially in view of the danger from the boll weevil? Yet the gentleman proposes to cut off $2,000 of that amount—cuts off that much—for an investigation of the breeding, selection, and cultural methods of cotton. I am opposed to it. I think it is to our interest to have cotton raised as cheaply as possible to meet the objection caused by the introduction of the boll weevil. I do not believe that gentlemen on that side of the aisle ought to desire to attempt to break down the inquiry into the improvement of cotton by cultural methods.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, in the first place, I desire to say to the gentleman from Illinois that the cultural work of the Department of Agriculture touching cotton in its larger and bigger operations is carried in another item of this bill, in the boll-weevil item, where we are appropriating something like $332,000.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question? Is it not true, in the item of which the gentleman speaks, that you have cut down that item that heretofore carried $350,000 and inserted $332,000?

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman is talking about something else.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I am talking about the boll-weevil item on page 22.

Mr. LEVER. That is in another section. Let me say to my friend that there are several items in this bill touching the boll weevil.

Mr. TRIBBLE. What two items, except the one the gentleman was just inquiring about and the one I am inquiring about?

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will turn over a little further, he will find "for the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton-boll weevil, $332,960."

Mr. WICKLIFFE. On page 22, lines 1 to 3, inclusive.

Mr. MANN. You have cut that down.

Mr. TRIBBLE. The appropriation last year was $350,000, and now you have cut it down to $332,000.

Mr. LEVER. I will say we gave in this bill exactly what the department asked for, and the department always asks for enough, as the gentleman is probably aware.

Mr. TRIBBLE. We may ask for more, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. MANN. The department has never asked for enough for this; we have always increased it in the House.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I agree with the gentleman in that thoroughly—I mean with the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. LEVER. Let me say further to the gentleman from Illinois that we have the absolute assurance from Dr. Galloway that the simple decrease of 5 or 6 per cent in this appropriation here is not going to interfere with his work and will not interfere in the least with the authority which he has under this item to conduct the experiments which he is doing. If I thought so, I would be in line with the gentleman, but we have the assurance of Dr. Galloway it will not interfere at all.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will agree with me that Dr. Galloway is one of the most expert and competent men in the Government or any other service. [Applause.] And he appreciates the position which he occupies. He will take whatever Congress gives to him in the way of money and make the best use of it. He will undoubtedly agree with the committee if you cut off $2,000 or $20,000, and he will do the best he can with what is appropriated; but I do not believe that the cultural methods and breeding and selection of cotton have reached that degree of perfection that we ought to reduce the appropriation for that purpose, and, Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment to strike out, on page 19, line 25, the words "thirty-one thousand dollars" and insert in lieu thereof the words "thirty-three thousand six hundred and seventy dollars," so that it will read:

And for the improvement of cotton by cultural methods, breeding, and selection, $33,670.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, line 25, strike out the words "thirty-one thousand dollars" and insert in lieu thereof the words "thirty-three thousand six hundred and seventy dollars."

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I thoroughly agree with the gentleman from Illinois in his amendment. I can not see why this committee has not increased the appropriation for the destruction of the boll weevil anywhere from $300,000 to $500,000 instead of cutting it down.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman can not come on the floor of this House and show this committee such progress made in the last two years in the destruction of the boll weevil as will authorize a decrease in appropriation. Then, should we not have an increase instead of diminishing the previous appropriation? Why, sir, there is not a pest in the history of this country so destructive to the interests of the South and to the farmers of the South as the boll weevil. There has never been a pest in the history of this country so destructive as the boll weevil. It is a pest that moves upon a country like the pestilence of war. It comes and causes more destruction often than a moving army, because it comes at night, it comes unseen, and in a few days the poor man is left without a crop. He plants for 50 bales of cotton, say, and he does not get a single bale. Men plant and expect to reap and live upon their work at the end of the year. They start at the beginning of the year with little. They buy during the year the supplies necessary to make a crop. The boll weevil comes and leaves them without a dollar, with not a cent to pay for the supplies previously purchased, and no money to live on during the following year.

Where can you conceive of a more destructive thing than the boll weevil? It is advancing upon the borders of Georgia, and I for one will not stand here upon the floor of this House, representing a constituency of farmers, and submit to a reduction in the appropriation for the destruction of the boll weevil. Let us appropriate more; let us build some experimental stations; let us get busy and destroy or kill the effect of the boll weevil to as great an extent as possible.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I agree heartily with what the gentleman from Georgia has said in regard to the nature and extent of the ravages of the boll weevil. No pest has visited any section of the country which has been more destructive. But it is further disclosed that the scientific men, and the practical men also, who have gone into the South and studied this question, have determined to a finality that there is nothing they can do further than they have done to investigate the habits of the boll weevil. They have discovered nothing that they can do to overcome the effects of its visitation, except to teach the people of the section of the country visited by it diversified agriculture. Money has been spent to pay the services and expenses of men to go into the South to teach diversified agriculture. In farm demonstration and in farm management Government work is being done there, and wonderful progress being made. And I venture the assertion that the boll weevil has been really a blessing to the States of the South, and that the gentlemen who have thoroughly studied the question will admit the truth of the statement I make to that effect.

Now, if the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] will offer an amendment to the provisions of this bill which will carry money for further work along demonstration lines or farm management lines, to pay for the services and the expenses of men to go into the South to teach better methods of agriculture and to teach different agriculture from what has been carried on there, I will not raise my voice against it. But to increase the appropriation for further investigation of the boll weevil, its habits, and for the discovery of something to overcome it, I do not believe is called for, and I submit that sufficient appropriation is carried in this amendment.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Is not the purpose of the amendment which I have offered the very thing the gentleman suggests, namely, to increase the appropriation for the adaptation of crops introduced from tropical regions into the very country where the boll weevil is prevalent? That is the item which is under consideration.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that I think the gentleman from Illinois is right. I was somewhat under misapprehension as to the item under discussion, but the main appropriation for farm demonstration and farm management, by which the people of the South are getting such great benefit, is carried in still another part of the bill, namely, at the foot of page 21, where the bill carries $186,020, and at the top of page 22, where the bill carries $332,960. It may be that proper use can be made of the $31,000. Possibly it is to be used along the same line. If it is, the amount should not be reduced, and I would be the last to stand in the way of an increase of it if the department is in shape to use the increased amount of money.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment has been exhausted, but the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the gentleman from Georgia called upon me to verify a statement, I would like to make a few remarks. I can not agree with the opinion of the gentleman from Georgia, that the department has made no progress in discovering cultural methods by which the boll weevil can be destroyed, or rather by which his ravages can be greatly minimized. If I did agree with that opinion I would not favor an increase in the appropriation which provides for the war that the department is making.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Is it not true that the boll weevil makes his progress and is going on right straight to the State of Georgia with his ravages just as he has always been doing, and with as much destruction?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. That is probably true. But nevertheless, where the boll weevil has been and where he has wrought great damage many planters, by adopting the cultural methods advised by the Department of Agriculture, have been able to make as good and as profitable crops as they were able to make before.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to file here with my remarks letters from farmers who live right in the midst of the boll-weevil country, who have gone out and have successfully combated the scourge and made just as much cotton as they did before. I have a list here, and the names upon it are not confined to those who have made little demonstration crops of one or two acres. I have the name of one man, for instance, who had 200 acres in cotton right in the midst of the boll-weevil invasion.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. In a minute. That farmer produced last year on his 200 acres an average of 1,800 pounds. I think it is very rare that the gentleman can find 200 acres that will produce more than that without the boll weevil. On another plantation there were 2,000 acres in cotton, where they averaged 900 pounds in one of the worst crop years we ever had; and yet it produced an average of 900 pounds to the acre, because the planter followed the methods prescribed by the Department of Agriculture.

For that reason I would favor a liberal appropriation to enable this Government to continue the work in which it is engaged. If I believed they had made no progress, then I would think there was no further occasion to spend money.

Mr. LEVER. This is not the item, anyhow.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No; I understand this is not the item. I believe that the reduction in the production of cotton is due more to panic than it is to the ravages of the boll weevil. Men abandon the crop. They are afraid to supply their hands. The fields lie barren and uncultivated. As a matter of course, they do not produce cotton on them. But where they do plant and where they do observe the cultural methods prescribed by the department, the fact is that they make the cotton.

I think the worst possible doctrine that the gentleman can preach to those communities before the boll weevil gets in is that the department has so far been unable to ascertain successful methods by which the boll weevil can be combated and cotton grown successfully under boll-weevil conditions. [Applause.]

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. In just a second. In my county this year, on a plantation where the boll weevil has been for three years, one gentleman made 448 pounds of lint to the acre in the poorest crop year we have had in that country since I have lived in it.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Will the gentleman describe the first year when the boll weevil struck him?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Its ravages are dreadful.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois and Mr. MANN asked unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] be allowed to continue for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The first year is more disastrous—is more calamitous—and, as I believe, the principal reason for it is that farmers, like all other people in this world, have to profit by their own experience. Members here talk about the "dude employees" of this department, to use the expression which I have heard here on the floor to-day, and refer to "these paper farmers." They do not believe that the Department of Agriculture has men of practical experience who will teach them anything, so they continue to cultivate their cotton in the same old way. They pursue the same old methods, believing that they know more about it than the experts from the department. The result is that when December comes around they have not got a crop. The next year, however, and the following year, the boll weevil is still there, but they begin to see the light. Then they plant their cotton in wider rows and pursue the other methods prescribed by the department, and the result is that they make cotton. I will present and have printed in the RECORD letters from farmer after farmer who in the midst of the most destructive period of the boll weevil have made good crops. For that reason I am in favor of liberal appropriations by the Federal Government, because I believe we are doing good. If I believed to the contrary, if I believed that we had not discovered any method and were not making any progress, I would not have the courage to stand here and ask for further appropriations.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Can the gentleman tell me how much land depreciated in value the first year that the boll weevil struck his locality?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. My opinion is that land values are not very readily affected. I can not answer specifically. If they are depreciated, it is only temporarily. After they have followed the advice of the department and taken advantage of the experience of those who have successfully fought the weevil, in every case whatever depreciation there may have been is counterbalanced and the land advances in price. The time when the land depreciates in value is just about the year before the boll weevil comes. He comes about September and the next year he does the greatest damage. When he appears the people become panic-stricken. The bankers are afraid to let the merchants have money, and the merchants therefore can not let the farmers have supplies, so that the farmers can not plant cotton and the fields lie idle. But five years afterward the land is just as valuable as it was before, if not more so.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Does the gentleman think that my State and the State of Alabama should go through the experience of absolute destruction simply because the gentleman's section has had to go through it?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Certainly not. I said I was in favor of this appropriation, because I knew it was doing good. If you preach the doctrine to your people that the greatest calamity that has ever befallen them is now impending, you will discourage the farmers. But preach to them the doctrine of hope, point them back to the regions where the boll weevil has been and where they have successfully combated it, and point them to the methods prescribed by the department and say, "Therein lies your salvation," and assure them that if they will follow that method they will succeed.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Does the gentleman think it will discourage the people to tell them that the Agricultural Department is helping them?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I want to help them.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Then why do you agree with these gentlemen who want to cut down the appropriation?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I do not agree with them. My whole argument was in favor of an appropriation. If it was not doing any good, however, I would propose to cut it down; but I believe it is doing good, and therefore I want to maintain it.

The following are the letters referred to:

COL. MAXWELL TELLS HOW TO FIGHT WEEVIL—BIG LOUISIANA COTTON GROWER ADDRESSES GREENWOOD RALLY.

A big agriculture rally was held in Greenwood last Saturday at the courthouse. There was present a good audience to listen to the suggestions of the speakers present, among whom were officers of the Mississippi State Farm Institute and Col. F. M. Maxwell, of Louisiana, who is reckoned as the most successful and one of the biggest planters of that State.

Col. Maxwell accepted an invitation to be here on this date and address them as to how he managed to whip the boll weevil and raise the cotton he did under the prevalent circumstances.

The following is Col. Maxwell's speech verbatim:

HOW TO FIGHT WEEVIL.

"Ladies and Gentlemen: I am here to talk to you about the boll weevil and raising cotton under boll-weevil conditions. I perhaps have had more experience, spent more time and money, than most men of this country investigating the boll weevil. Several years ago, when they had the boll weevil in Texas, I went there on a committee from Shreveport to investigate the boll-weevil infested sections. The thing was being agitated. People were holding conventions to talk the matter over. At this convention in Texas we had a Capt. Marshall, a man who advocated that he could kill the boll weevil with Paris green, and pointed out places where he had succeeded, and declared that he would not take $1,000 for the discovery. We also had with us then a Dr. Hunter and a Dr. Knapp, and they both discussed that matter of Paris green with detail after detail, and they both declared that we would not be benefited by Paris green. The committee was appointed at Shreveport to go to Texas and investigate conditions. When we got ready the railroad company furnished a man to go with us, free of charge, and take us from place to place over the State. We traveled around considerably over the State of Texas and investigated matters very closely. We had Dr. Hunter with us. We saw his experiments, saw his ants—which, by the way, were a failure—and we went and investigated Capt. Marshall's patches under the Paris green treatment. We interviewed bankers, merchants, planters, farmers, and everybody, and we found a big territory in Texas in poor, sandy, post-oak country, in which they had given up the raising of cotton—couldn't do it—which was almost abandoned, looked dilapidated. But when we struck the black belt we struck lands, and we found no depreciation in value whatever. Lands were being held at $60 per acre, although they had the boll weevil several years. Their lands were very much like ours here—black lands, perhaps, doesn't grow grass as well. They were making a half bale of cotton and over per acre, about what they made before the boll weevil came, but they were good farmers.

"KEEP WEEVIL DOWN.

"They plowed their land well, pulverized it thoroughly and cultivated it well, got the cotton up early, plowed it early, cleaned up and burned up every ditch bank where the boll weevil could hide, and in that way kept them down until they could make a crop of cotton. We visited Capt. Marshall. We found that he had a pasture of about 20 acres, 4 or 5 acres on the east side of the field next to the railroad, where there were a gin and oil mill. It was thought that the boll weevil came from these. There was some cotton of the same kind on the west side of the track, and here Capt. Marshall had used his poison.

"We decided to make a thorough investigation of the use of Paris green. We counted the stalks and the bolls where he had used the poison and where he had not. We found that he had one boll more where he had used the poison than where he had not.

"We came back home, and there was another convention called at Shreveport, and we again had with us Capt. Marshall, who made us a talk, and he talked and read his address for two hours, and pointed out that he had solved the problem and that he could kill the boll weevil with Paris green. I wanted to reply to him, but they would not let me—said he was sick; that he would have a row if I did. When we got through that night we adjourned until the next morning. I said to the chairman that we wanted to discuss that matter again that we had discussed last night. Capt. Marshall said that he can kill and poison boll weevils by the use of Paris green, and we have people here from all over the State, and they'll go home and spend their money for Paris green and will be no better thereby. When he called the meeting to order, I stated that we had Government officials present who had studied this business for years; that we had Dr. Hunter with us, who was at the head of the movement, and we would like to hear from Dr. Hunter. Dr. Hunter gave us details extending over years, and showed thoroughly that Paris green had done no good whatever, except when put in one spot when the cotton was young; when it was put on the young square, and the weevil got into the bud and ate the bud, and that was the only time. When he got through, I called on Dr. Knapp, who was there, and he stated that Paris green has been tested by 1,000 persons; that he had received from them 999 letters; and that he had only received one letter in which it was stated that Paris green had been of benefit at all, and he was uncertain that he was benefited at all.

"PARIS GREEN FAILS.

"This convinced me that it was of no use whatever to use Paris green. I make this statement, gentlemen, so if there is anybody here who thinks he can kill the boll weevil by poisoning him, he had better write Dr. Hunter and find out about it. I don't think he will advise any of you to use Paris green. I investigated this matter further in Louisiana one spring. The boll weevil had struck Red River and hit it a mighty hard lick over there. About one-half of the planters gave it up altogether. However, there were a lot of good farmers that stuck to the business. They went right ahead and made good cotton, and they're making good cotton to-day, and they have been making money, and making money with the boll weevil. I found, on talking to them and going around with them, that they had cut out all the land that would not mature cotton quickly. You all know, every planter here knows, that we can not get land with water standing on it to warm up in time to make cotton under boll-weevil conditions; therefore, I say, cut out all of that; put it into corn and oats, or something else; it will make better corn if you had the water off, but you can make corn, oats, lespedeza on pretty wet land. Don't plant that wet land in cotton, because you can't get ahead of the boll weevil; it is a race from start to finish; if you don't beat the boll weevil it beats you.

"The first thing to do is to clean up all your land where you have grassy patches or places where the boll weevils can hide, ditch banks, etc., destroy all the boll weevils you possibly can, for every one you destroy now you are done with him. If he comes out and gets into the cotton and you don't destroy him he will give you plenty of weevils; they come thick and fast and in a hurry.

"PLOW LAND EARLY.

"Next, plow your land as early as possible; the weather has been such that there has been very little plowing done yet. Most of the land should have been plowed by this time, but it has been impossible to do so. The earlier and deeper and the better you pulverize and prepare your lands, the better your crops will be. Everybody knows that it is impossible to get a good stand and an early crop on land that has just been plowed up; the ground will harden and pack down and form a crust. If you plant it and there comes a beating rain and the cotton comes up and stands there in that growing condition, it takes all the vitality. You must get the cotton in; plant as early as possible; plant it shallow in a seed bed so that it will grow right off.

"Next, work it as early as possible; don't let the grass and the weeds get the start. I frequently use a section harrow right across the ridges, and sometimes harrow two or three times in that manner. If you will start as soon as it rains and put your harrows on, you will destroy all the weeds and grass just started. It is much easier to destroy it then. Avoid the low places.

"All that have black land—I suspect you have been told that you could not raise cotton on black land—but I want to say to you that you can raise cotton on black land and mature it more quickly than on sandy lands. If your land is drained well, so that you have a good loose seed bed, and plant it early, it will make better than sandy land. You can plant it earlier than in sandy land, because there you have lice, which in black land does not trouble you. I plant my black land—plow it—first; most farmers commence on to front and plow back; I commence on the back and work forward the sandy land, toward the front. The black land must have rain; therefore I plow and plant it first, and I mature cotton there first. Last year I picked cotton two weeks earlier on the back of my place than on the front. Some of you perhaps have not looked into the matter very closely. Be certain to drain out all low places, so as to not leave any water standing; you can not raise cotton with water standing.

"PLANT EARLY VARIETY.

"Plant as early a variety as possible and a cotton that does not make large limbs and large leaves. With the boll weevils you want all the sun and air on the cotton you can get. And we have found by experiment that the big boll cotton that makes big leaves and large limbs, covering the ground, make the best possible place for the weevils to hide and breed. The other lets the sun and air in. You can plant it thicker, put the rows closer together, and you can plant it thicker in the drill, and we have been getting more cotton. I am going to give you before I get through a test I made with 21 different varieties of cotton.

"Begin to cultivate as soon as the cotton comes up. Cultivate until you commence to pick. Cultivate shallow as to not destroy the root. Cut as few surface roots as possible. Whenever you cut roots of cotton—it is like corn—you destroy the vitality and stop it from making cotton.

"I have found the Simpkins cotton best. There may be better cotton, but the Simpkins has proven best to me, and I have tried a good many.

"Through this country I do not think there are many fertilizers being used. I have found that an old land—on our bayous, where they have been cultivated for years, as it is called worn-out lands—I have found nitrate of soda the best. It will start the cotton off two weeks earlier; therefore, if you have any of that kind of land, I would suggest that you try nitrate of soda; put from 30 to 50 pounds to the acre. I take a little bucket and weigh it out and decide how much I want to put to the acre, and the hands spread it along. Then run your cultivator and mix it with the soil. It dissolves right away. By the time the cotton begins to make fruit well put on another application; put it in by hand; it is damp, draws dampness, and it is hard to get a machine that will put it in unless you mix it with something dry.

"PLANT TRAP COTTON.

"The boll weevil goes into the woods and hides, and very soon they will come out. As soon as the weather is warm enough they will go into the first crop. I would suggest that you plant two or three rows of cotton all around where there are woods; that cotton will come up, and the boll weevils will come out of the woods and go into that cotton first. When they go in there, you may go out early in the morning and find them; it is much easier to go over two or three acres than a whole field.

"I had only a little patch last year, about an acre, planted next to the woods, then I had a strip of corn, and then the cotton began. Off of that little patch there next to the woods we picked off over 1,000 grown boll weevils. They came in as early as April. This patch was cultivated by an Italian and his children. He got over 1,200 boll weevils, but still he made two-thirds of a bale of cotton to the acre in that patch.

"REDUCE ACREAGE.

"Reduce your acreage. I cut mine down to 50 per cent. Planted rice, corn, oats, grass, clover, etc.; cut down the cotton half, and then gradually increase as your hands learn the nature of the weevil. I had one Italian that made 18 bales of cotton on 21 acres; one made 15 to 19 bales on 20 acres; these are exceptions. Some made as little as 5 bales on the same amount of land, but some had better land and better chances. I plant my best land in cotton; we had lots of land that made over a bale to the acre. The average was 1,125 pounds of seed cotton to the acre on one place on which we kept a strict account. I think the other lands will average as good. I will give the test of 21 different varieties of cotton I planted. The cotton was planted April 25, 1911. In this experiment there were two rows in each variety, all in the same kind of ground, and the same length of rows:

1. Truitt, 35 pounds.
2. Caldwell's Big Boll, 50 pounds.
3. Dillon's Wilt Proof, 16 pounds.
4. Triumph, 50 pounds.
5. Hastings's Big Boll, 50 pounds.
6. Broadwell's Double-Jointed, 65 pounds.
7. Alexander's, 65 pounds.
8. Hawkins's Improved, 65 pounds.
9. Mortgage Litter, 65 pounds.
10. Russell's Big Boll, 55 pounds.
11. Tool's Improved, 65 pounds.
12. Money Maker, 55 pounds.
13. Simpkins's Home-Grown Seed, 75 pounds.
14. King's Home-Grown Seed, 70 pounds.
15. Missouri Green, 60 pounds.
16. Unknown Staple, 25 pounds.

- "17. Sent for Upland Staple, turned out to be Egyptian, 0 pounds.
- "18. Sunflower Staple, 50 pounds.
- "19. Columbia Staple, 50 pounds.
- "20. Unknown, 35 pounds.
- "21. Allen's Staple, 15 pounds.
- "22. Simpkins's Direct from Simpkins, N. C., 70 pounds.

"RESULTS OF TESTS."

"I have another test made under the suggestion of the Government, made with staple cotton for the year of 1911, under the direction of Prof. Bennett, of Paris, Tex.

"Plot 1: Three acres; planted April 28, 1911, with Columbia; was well worked every eight days; picked out in December; weighed 3,700 pounds of seed cotton; yield 1,233½ seed to acre.

"Plot 2: Seven acres; planted April 28, 1911, and given same cultivation and land; picked out December to January 5; weighed 1,095½ seed cotton to the acre.

"Plot 3: Planted April 28, 1911; same cultivation; same land; planted with Sunflower seed; four-fifths of an acre; picked in January; 1,195 pounds of seed cotton, or at the rate of 1,434 to the acre.

"The seed of both Columbia and Allen was low in vitality and I did not get a good stand. I would not advise you to plant very much staple cotton until you get your labor broken in, so that you can make cotton with the boll weevil. I made these experiments at the suggestion of the Government. You should plant the kind that matures early."

At this juncture several questions were asked by local planters, to which he gave cheerful answers, throwing much light upon the local situation.

COTTON IN SPITE OF BOLL WEEVIL.

GILBERT, LA., November 10, 1910.

Mr. W. L. CHASE, Chase, La.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your inquiry as to our results as to the raising of cotton under weevil conditions, I beg to submit the following report for the year 1910:

L. M. Calhoun, Jr., has ginned 79 bales off of 80 acres, weighing 500 pounds each, with 10 pounds lint over. He has ginned 91 bales off of what he estimated to be 90 acres when he planted, weighing 500 pounds each, with 139 pounds lint over. I inclose you a picture of his cotton, taken October 1, 1910. One picking had been taken off his cotton previous to the taking of the photograph. The man on the horse does not show the full height of cotton, as he is standing on a mound. The man on the mule shows the proper height. You will note the mule's head above the cotton.

W. H. Whittington, of Gilbert, La., has ginned 10 bales from 11 acres, weighing 510 pounds each, with 500 pounds seed cotton over.

T. B. Gilbert, Jr., of Wisner, La., has averaged three-fourths of a bale per acre on 1,000 acres. Much of this cotton has made a heavy bale per acre. I can not give you the weights, as he has not completed ginning.

W. F. Butler, of Chase, La., has ginned and sold five bales of staple cotton from 7 acres, with the following weights—515, 555, 600, 585—which sold at 24 cents per pound f. o. b., netting him $684 for the lint and $752.19 for seed and lint, besides saving one bale of seed for planting.

A. W. McDuff, of Chase, La., made one bale per acre. I have not gotten weights yet.

A. W. Sanders, of Chase, La., reported to me 20 bales from 21 acres. I will report the weights to you later.

This is a fair sample of the results we are getting here under boll-weevil conditions by cooperating fully with the representatives of the cooperative demonstrative work in charge of Dr. S. A. Knapp, of Washington, D. C.

Yours, very truly,

L. M. CALHOUN, District Agent.

BOLL-WEEVIL SITUATION—MR. W. W. MANGUM, OF NEW ORLEANS, WRITES COMPREHENSIVELY.

The following letter on the boll-weevil situation should be carefully perused by every planter in the infected district. It is written by a man who has studied the condition and knows what advice to give:

YAZOO CITY, MISS., December 31, 1910.

Mr. W. W. MANGUM,
1907 Napoleon Avenue, New Orleans, La.:

DEAR SIR: I understand that you had a good deal of experience in raising cotton in boll-weevil conditions. I would appreciate it if you would write me a letter giving me the value of your experience, especially along the line as to the character of cotton to plant; whether you can successfully raise long-staple cotton under boll-weevil conditions; the time the cotton should be planted; how wide apart the rows should be planted to the mule; and whether or not there is any special benefit derived from picking up the punctured squares; and any other information you can give me as to how to raise cotton under boll-weevil conditions.

A reply to this will be appreciated.

Your friend,

T. H. CAMPBELL, Sr.

P. S.—I would like to publish your letter, as I think your information would be valuable to every farmer in this county, as the boll weevil is undoubtedly here, and this is the second, and in some places the third year of his appearance.

C.

MR. MANGUM'S REPLY.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., January 3, 1911.

T. C. CAMPBELL, Sr.,
Yazoo City, Miss.

DEAR MR. CAMPBELL: Yours of 31st to hand. The questions you ask in regard to boll weevils require a letter at length in order to cover the subject.

From personal observation, investigation, and experience I unhesitatingly state that under following conditions paying crops of cotton can be grown:

First. A selection of good, pliable soil, easily drained. No stiff or cold lands.

Second. Cleared of all grasses and weeds, cornstalks and cotton stalks included, before the planting is done, in order to make it become homogeneous, which enables it to become warm sooner, thus germinating seed much quicker.

Third. A selection of some one of the early prolific varieties of seed and plant as early as season will permit—not later than April 10.

Fourth. After chopping to a stand, the most vigorous, active, continuous cultivation should be, must be, kept up in order to force growth and maturity and to cover up all of the fallen squares that may be caused by weevils that the squads can not pick up and destroy. (If good results are expected.) If this is done the farmer will get good results.

Fifth. The squads should be taught to watch and pick up fallen squares as soon after cotton begins to form, and keep it up as long as practical. After July 1 it is useless; the cultivators and sweeps should cover those that fall later, and run until picking begins. (It is well to remark that it is a scientific fact that the weevils do not mate or copulate until squares are formed.)

From closest observation and my results obtained on large plantations in Louisiana the past year of 1910, I know that those who acted upon the foregoing brought good results out of disastrous years preceding and hope out of despair. Many had and have practically abandoned large, valuable plantations, and tried rice. A ride through them looks like desolation, and for many of them it is so, for at least the present. I cite one instance. A large cotton-planting company of Tensas Parish planted only a small acreage in cotton in 1909. Realizing later that it was folly to give up such land, they determined upon the new method, as outlined in the foregoing of this article, and made 1,160 tied bales of cotton in 1910, 300 pounds to the acre; besides plenty of corn, thousands of bushels to sell; and have sold a lot of hogs, etc., and all seed and cotton turned into money, with a net result of over $40,000 clear profit over and above all disbursements. There are others who have done proportionately as well, but they are very few. Many others have continued on large scale, but, due to improper efforts and selection, have made heavy losses.

I see clearly that there is no advantage to be gained by planting in wider rows in this valley. I would not make any change in them, and am inclined to leave the stand closer because, with better preparation and more vigorous tilling, the cotton will fruit more rapidly and the percentage that will mature will increase yields. Except experimentally and with scientific application of commercial fertilizers, I would not waste any time or money on long-staple cotton. On a large scale it may cause too great a loss.

For years I have in a most practicable manner tried the different varieties. I give you the name of varieties that I tested:

First. Kings is the earliest and shortest staple.

Second. Tooles Prolific 1½ staple, about one week later.

Third. Triumph, a big boll, rather prolific, and about 7 to 10 days later than Kings; but it is 1½ staple.

Fourth. Simpkins, quite early, but an unsatisfactory variety, as compared to others. (Anything from Carolinas is called Simpkins.)

It takes of Kings, Tooles Prolific, and Simpkins about 80 bolls to make a pound, while it takes only 55 bolls of the Triumph. The advantage of the large boll is this: First, it has a thicker hull and no doubt is harder to penetrate as it matures than the smaller varieties; again, if one lock in the larger boll is destroyed the remaining locks will give as much lint as there will be in the smaller boll not affected by a weevil. The foregoing points in regard to size of bolls and length of staple should meet with careful consideration and be tested fully by the individual planter. It is the only way that I obtained this knowledge. The Government recommends highly, too, the Cleveland Big Boll, not the Russell Big Boll.

I found that Tooles Prolific, on average 1,000-acre crop, gave a yield of 36½ per cent of lint. It is the highest on a large scale I ever got. The Triumph, on 300 acres, gave 34½ per cent. The King never gave me over 32½ per cent of lint.

I suggest that you ask the Alexander Seed Co., of Augusta, Ga., to secure you a few bushels each of selected Kings and Tooles. It was six years ago that in reply to an inquiry they advised me to test Tooles. I have not regretted it. I had for years before planted the Kings. Then I would write W. F. Brown & Co., produce men, Memphis, and ask them to secure you some of the same kind of Triumph that they sold me two years ago. Both firms are good, reliable people.

If you are going to plant largely this year, and you can secure enough of these three varieties to make a full planting, I certainly would do so, though the prices will make a good big hole in your bank account; but it will be small compared to the hole that will be there at the end of the year unless you get such varieties and see that they are properly planted and worked.

The good results of anticipating the approach of the weevil will be that the farmer will have started raising root and grain crops and stock in connection with the certainty of a money crop.

If your farmers will only realize that Louisiana made over 1,000,000 bales of cotton six years ago and rapidly decreased to 275,000 in 1909 and will not get over 250,000 in 1910, they can feel confident that in a few years—unless they begin preparations immediately along the lines suggested in this article and follow it up—there is no reason to hope or expect Mississippi to make over 700,000 bales in 1913; and those (I fear only a small proportion) who do try will get the benefit of the certainty of continued good prices—for the yield of Texas, pounds per acre, can never grow any larger. This error in thinking that Texas makes as much cotton as it did before the weevil existed consists in the fact that the acreage has increased enormously year after year, and since 1892, when the weevil appeared, there are over 40 counties planting now that were unoccupied then. It, too, is practically a prairie without weeds, woodlands, and it is hot and dry, while we have hibernating places everywhere. Again, the population since then has increased over one and one-fourth millions. The spread of the weevil is so certain, so steady, that until natural laws introduce parasites that will occasionally lessen them you and I will not see another bumper crop—i. e., per acre—nor will we see any more very cheap cotton. Surely the warnings that the States and that the Government and the sad result of a State like Louisiana—crop being reduced from $80,000,000 six years ago to only $20,000,000 the past year—should be incentive to every cotton grower to be up and doing. It is folly to cowardly lie down and give up.

I forgot to mention that it is very important where two mules or horses can be used, riding or walking, double or wheel cultivators should be used. From 5 to 7 acres a day can be made with one hand and far more satisfactory work is done; and after each row is driven down it is ready for a rain. It is one of the economies greatly needed.

Wishing you a prosperous New Year, I am, your friend,

W. W. MANGUM.

YAZOO COUNTY NEWS.

SUCCESSFUL PLANTERS IN BOLL-WEEVIL TERRITORY.

Mr. G. H. ALFORD, West Jackson, Miss.

DEAR MR. ALFORD: I planted 160 acres in cotton this year. I have tied 73 bales. I planted on land that was in corn and peas last year and turned under deep with disk plows in the fall.

I planted Allen's Hybrid, Simpkins, Triumph, and Cleveland's Big Boll. I can't say positively which of the short staples I like best, but I lean to the Triumph and Cleveland. It may be that the Simpkins was more prolific, but the fiber is not as good and does not command the price.

I used no fertilizer this year, but expect to experiment with acid phosphate a little next year.

I cultivated the cotton once a week until the last of August. I also picked the weevils and squares until the middle of July. I do not think that it pays to pick the squares after the second crop; then cultivate instead.

I feel confident that we can raise profitable crops of cotton on rich, well-drained land. I think that the season cut my yield off half. I had to plant my crop over from April 28 to May 10.

In the 100 acres of cotton is included 8 acres of long staple, planted May 15. The weevil played havoc, as it only made 800 pounds of seed cotton. This cotton pulled the average down, and the price will have to be high to make it profitable over the short early cottons.

B. G. HUMPHREYS.

PORT GIBSON, MISS.

DR. H. GUY HATHORN, Columbia, Miss.

DEAR DOCTOR: I will endeavor to answer your questions in regular sequence.

First. Character of land? Both upland and alluvial.

Second. We planted from 1,000 to 1,200 acres of cotton. While a great deal of it this year makes 500 pounds of lint per acre, we suppose that the average is about 375 pounds.

Third. We pay no attention to the acreage per mule, but see to it that we have plenty of teams to thoroughly work the crop.

Fourth. We destroyed all stalks by cutting and burning last fall, and did considerable winter plowing, but not all.

Fifth. We think the early destruction of stalks the keynote to the situation in a normal year, but in the present instance I believe that the freeze here has accomplished the same result.

Sixth. We picked up and destroyed squares till about the middle of July, and consider it as important as stalk destruction.

Seventh. Rows about 4½ feet; in drills, 2 to 3 feet.

Eighth. Money-maker, Tooles and Simpkins; in fact, any early variety.

Ninth. Did not use any fertilizer—unnecessary here.

Tenth. Plant as early as possible, say, April 1 to 15.

This, we believe, answers your questions in full. We have had the weevil for four years; during the first two years demoralization reigned supreme; now I can say that during an experience of 25 years there is more money and prosperity here than I ever saw.

T. B. GILBERT, Wisner, La.

FRIEND ALFORD: I planted 35 acres in cotton and made 18 bales. I made 9 bales on one 12-acre cut. I did not use any fertilizer.

I broke the land good and deep with two-mule plows and cultivated the beds down and made a good seed bed. As soon as the cotton began to come up I harrowed on top of the beds. The cold killed the cotton, and I had to plant over.

It began to rain soon after the cotton came up the second time. I barred it off and plowed out with turning plows as often as possible and as often as I could catch it dry enough. I cultivated the beds down. The wet weather continued, and I continued to plow the cotton in order to keep down the grass and weeds. I continued to tear down the beds between plowings. Early in July the rains held up, and I used the cultivators once each week, and sometimes oftener. By this means I got an early growth of the cotton; and, as numerous as the weevils were this year, the cotton put on squares faster than the weevils could puncture them.

I checked the weevils early in June by picking them off the little cotton and later by gathering the punctured squares. I do not think that it pays to pick the squares until late in July.

We can make cotton, notwithstanding the weevil, on a small scale—say 4 to 6 acres to the mule; make up the acreage in other crops that we can use at home and feed to stock. By pursuing this course we will soon be independent.

RAISING OF COTTON DESPITE THE WEEVIL—HOW IT MUST BE DONE ON DELTA SOIL.

The following interesting correspondence concerning proper cotton-producing methods, which should be applied in Delta soil infested by the boll weevil, will prove of great importance and value to the reading public, and especially to planters:

GILBERT, LA., December 31, 1910.

MR. J. A. EVANS,
State Agent, Shreveport, La.

DEAR SIR: I beg to submit the following letter on "The raising of cotton under boll-weevil conditions on the Delta soil," and ask that it be published and distributed in the Mississippi Delta. Planters, merchants, and boards of trade have repeatedly written me for this information.

1. The labor problem.

To raise cotton profitably under weevil conditions requires better farming. To do better farming requires good labor, perfectly controlled. Therefore the labor problem should be the first consideration.

Do not become demoralized and let your labor leave. Your lands are worth but little without labor with which to cultivate it. Keep your labor and see that every man who is willing to work and make an honest living is given an opportunity. Help a man if he is willing to help himself.

2. The boll weevil.

It is necessary for every farmer to understand the habits and characteristics of the weevil in order that he may intelligently combat him. We are indebted to the Bureau of Entomology for this information. The average period of life of the hibernated weevil is about seven months. A weevil developed November 1, 1910, would have lived his average period of life by the 1st of June, 1911, at which time cotton has not begun forming in the Delta country. We can, therefore, reasonably expect but a very small per cent of weevil developed not later than November 1 any year would be alive to do much damage to the crop the ensuing year. It would be only necessary to destroy all punctured forms and prevent the raising of new generations until this small per cent of wintered weevils died. Then the fields would be clear of weevils as far as material damage to the yield until the migrating period, about August 10. The wintered weevil continues to come to the cotton from early spring until July 1. At this period he confines himself to a small area, not even passing across a turn row to another cut. It is therefore profitable to you to fight him even if your neighbor does not. His traveling is principally done in the early fall. After passing through the winter without food he is so weakened that he is unable to travel a great distance in search of cotton. It is the weevil that winters in or very near your farm that infests your cotton. By cleaning and burning hedgerows, trees, and stumps you destroy many of them.

3. Good drainage.

Good drainage is very essential in the making of cotton profitably on the Delta soils. There are three basic benefits from good drainage I wish to emphasize, viz: 1. It permits the air to penetrate deeply into the soil and fill the air chambers that were previously filled with water. This, aided by heat and moisture, is constantly converting the insoluble matter into available plant food for the next crop. 2. It enables you to cultivate rapidly and intensively without much loss of time from rainfall. 3. The soil warms and grows the plant to maturity much earlier, which is very important in the raising of cotton under weevil conditions.

4. Soils best adapted.

The soils that raise the best crops of cotton without the weevil are best suited to raise the best crops with the weevil. All of our demonstrations for three years have given the best yields from very fertile soils. Buckshot soil, where properly drained, has given magnificent yields.

In the Delta we have three soil formations—bluff, alluvial loam, and buckshot. On the bluff soil the water line is near the surface, and it should not be broken deeper unless you have a sufficient drainage to lower it. About 5 inches is at present the proper depth for breaking. The buckshot soil should be broken very deep. The deeper the better. Where it is practical, all land should be broken in beds, as it drains better and runs together less than when flat broken. Nothing should be burned from the land that can be plowed under and add organic matter to the soil. All seed beds should be made in time to settle before planting.

5. Seed varieties.

There are many standard improved varieties of cotton that are good. Our experience in a successful fight of three years has resulted in the adoption of King's Improved, Simpkins, Broadwell's Double-Jointed, and Money-maker. The three former varieties are similar, small stalk, light foliage, small boll, prolific, earliest to make and open, and must be picked early or it will waste. Staple very short.

The Money-maker is a stalk of greater vitality, good size, and medium foliage, bolls medium size, nine days later to bloom than above-mentioned varieties, but after this period fast and prolific, a great favorite on the bluff soils. All farmers should, where it is practical, save their own planting seed. (See Dr. S. A. Knapp's pamphlet on seed selection.) Home-grown seed possesses advantages over seed grown from other soils and in other climates. Where properly culled and saved they maintained their earliness in making and produce a stalk of greater vitality, capable of withstanding adverse weather conditions and minor insect pests. They will also produce a stronger and better staple, frequently commanding a premium. It is a good business proposition from an economic standpoint. You also avoid the danger of inoculating your soil with the germ of dreaded cotton wilt from infected territories. Plant as soon as danger of frost is over on a well-settled seed bed with surface well pulverized with harrow.

6. Distances.

Cotton should be given no greater distance in width of rows or drills with the weevil than was necessary on the same land without the weevil to get a maximum yield. Width of rows 4 to 5 feet, distance in drill 16 to 24 inches. The more fertile the land the greater the distance. You can not depend on sunshine, as there is seldom time in June or July when there is not a sufficiency of moisture to hatch the weevil if the form is left on the ground. A good stand of cotton is more necessary with the weevil than without.

7. Cultivation.

In the early stages of cultivation the farmer should hold the purpose rather than the method of execution in view, as adverse weather conditions might interfere with his method, but nothing should interfere with the purpose of getting the plant thinned out, clear of vegetation, and in good growing condition as early as possible, using the implement that will do the greatest amount of and best work at the least cost. On the fertile soils of the Delta with an excess of moisture, aggravated by the weevils, puncturing the early forms, the plant is likely to grow too fast at the expense of fruit. It is safe to cultivate at this stage by plowing close and deep around the plant, cutting its lateral roots, reducing its feeding surface until the weevils give way and the plant begins loading with forms. As dry weather approaches reverse to a flat shallow cultivation and continue weekly until August 15 or later. With the excessive rainfall and insufficient drainage it is impractical to entirely dispense with the turnplow in the cultivation of a cotton crop on the Delta soils. We believe the time is not far distant when we will have a drainage system of canals and tiling, and will then be able to cultivate exclusively with improved implements. But until that time comes we must educate the farmer to use the turnplow intelligently and to know when not to use it. In the cultivation of cotton with the turnplow care should be taken to use a stick break on the wing to prevent its throwing too much earth to the cotton, thereby breaking the lower limbs.

The cultivation of our cotton through the rainy period of 1909 and 1910 was done with the turnplow and Dixie cultivator, changing as the plant became well fruited and dry weather approached to 6-inch corn shovels with 24-inch heel sweeps run flat and shallow on an iron-foot Georgia stock; on the coco lands using Planet, jr., cultivators and solid sweeps.

8. Fertilizers.

It is not profitable to buy commercial fertilizers for cotton on the Delta soils, as they contain an abundance of nitrogen, phosphorus, and potash, being only deficient in organic matter, which should be supplied by crop rotation and legumes. A heavy crop of pea vines is of more value than $10 worth of commercial fertilizers per acre. Our best yields of cotton are made on pea-vine land.

9. Destruction of punctured forms.

All punctured forms should be picked up and burned, beginning with the first sign of puncture and kept up weekly until the natural shedding of the cotton becomes great. In 1909 and 1910 we destroyed forms until August 11. By this method you would lose but little from punctured bolls by the migrating weevil. Do not stop to figure on cost. Our farmers are doing it and make more clear money raising cotton with the weevil than before his appearance.

10. Destruction of stalks.

All cotton stalks should be destroyed not later than November 1, either by cutting and plowing under completely, eaten by cattle, or cut and burned. This is necessary to prevent the raising of late generations of weevils. As it is, they that live do the greatest damage to the following crop. This year the freeze, October 28, killed the weevil in the egg, larva, and pupa stage, and did for us what the destruction of the stalk would have done. In 1908 with these methods we made three-fourths of a bale per acre by August 10, the weevils getting all the cotton after this date.

EXHAUSTIVE EXPERIMENTS—JAMES B. ALLEN TESTS THE RELATIVE PRODUCTIVENESS AND VALUE OF VARIOUS KINDS OF COTTON.

Having made a test of 13 different varieties of cotton during the season of 1910, under boll-weevil conditions, and knowing that many will be interested in the result, I now make it public.

This test was made on level uplands that have been in cultivation for 75 years, and that were planted in corn and peas the previous season. All cotton stalks on the plantation had been cut and burned before November 15, the previous fall, the boll weevil having been in this section for three years.

The land was broken up in the fall into rows 4 feet 3 inches wide, and was gone over once with a disk harrow in January. Three hundred pounds of fertilizers per acre was applied, composed of equal parts of acid phosphate and cottonseed meal, when land was rebedded, a few weeks before planting.

When the cotton was up to a stand it was cultivated with Planet Junior cultivators, with 8-inch sweeps on right and rear arms and ordinary teeth on other arms, running as close to the cotton as possible without injuring it. This mode of cultivation was continued throughout the season as often as necessary, occasionally running down the water furrow with a middle buster. The cotton was chopped out when it had its third and fourth leaf on it, leaving one and two stalks every 18 to 20 inches, and was hoed later whenever necessary.

The boll weevil made their appearance after the cotton was cut to a stand, and as soon as found commenced picking them out of the terminal buds, where 95 per cent of them were found. This was mostly done by children.

As soon as the little squares commenced to form, 2 pounds of powdered arsenate of lead per acre was applied with a Champion dust gun. This gun blows the poison down into the buds and squares of the cotton where the boll weevil feeds. This poison was applied every eight days until four applications had been made. A man can cover from 4 to 6 acres per day with one of these guns.

The weevil were caught and punctured squares picked until August 1. The extra expense incurred above the ordinary cultivating expense was as follows:

300 pounds fertilizers	$3.00
8 pounds arsenate used	2.00
Labor of applying poison	.50
Picking weevils and squares	1.00

Total per acre 6.50

There were almost continuous rains during the time that the poison was being applied, which prevented getting the fullest benefit from the use of the poison.

STATE OF MISSISSIPPI, Claiborne County:

This day personally appeared before me, the undersigned authority, James B. Allen, who, being by me first duly sworn, states on oath that the above and foregoing statement is full, true, and correct.

JAS. B. ALLEN.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 4th day of January, 1911.

A. K. BRASHEAR, Chancery Clerk.

All these varieties of cotton were planted on the 19th day of April with a cotton planter, the Simpkins being planted over on the 7th day of May on account of very poor stand. The other varieties all had good stands.

The yield of the Simpkins was about 17 per cent less than other varieties of the same type. This loss was caused by the later planting of the Simpkins.

This test certainly proves that cotton can be grown at a good profit under boll-weevil conditions; and, furthermore, that the long-staple varieties yield a much greater profit, not only this season, but the same was the case in 1909 and also in 1908, as shown by experiments conducted in the Red River Valley by the Louisiana State Crop Pest Commission and published as their circular No. 26.

The use of powdered arsenate of lead has helped make these large yields possible under boll-weevil conditions.

JAS. B. ALLEN, Port Gibson, Miss.

The following list, showing areas cultivated and the yield per acre in Franklin County, La., where the boll weevil is doing his worst, was furnished me by Dr. S. A. Knapp, of the Department of Agriculture:

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I should like to say one word in reply to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS] have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked by the gentleman from Illinois that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS] have five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a short statement?

Mr. TRIBBLE. I will yield to the gentleman after I make a few remarks.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield for the purpose of having the amendment again reported?

Mr. TRIBBLE. I do not want the time taken out of my time. I decline to yield for that purpose. Mr. Chairman, I have no criticism to make of the Department of Agriculture for the work it has been doing. The department has been doing a magnificent work. I am standing on the floor of this House and contending that we should increase the appropriations for the Department of Agriculture instead of cutting them off. The arguments of gentlemen who have appeared on the floor of the House to-day opposing this increase and proposing to cut down this appropriation appear to me to be inconsistent. Instead of criticizing the department, I have the highest praise for the Agricultural Department. The people of Georgia are pleased with what the Agricultural Department has done for my State. They are pleased with the work of Secretary Wilson. He has been in our State, and the work of the Agricultural Department has been there, and we can boast that 100 boys on 100 acres of land have produced an average of 100 bushels of corn per acre. No other State in the Union can beat it. We give Secretary Wilson credit, certainly, for a part of this progress. The advancement of the price of land in Georgia is largely due to the fact that it has been only within the last few years that our State has been regarded one of the first States in the Union in the production of corn. It is well established that Georgia is one of the first in the Union in the production of all agricultural products, and that cotton is not the only product we can raise with profit.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I can not agree with the gentleman that simply because the boll weevil comes and destroys the crop for a year, and then in the second year conditions improve, then after a season he comes again, and subsequently prices go upward, I can not agree that we should go through this experience of a destructive period of two or three years, when, as I have said, this experience described by the gentleman from Mississippi is almost equal to war pestilence for a season. Why should you inflict that on us simply because other States have gone through this trial and rallied from it?

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRIBBLE. In the gentleman's reference to present price of land in Mississippi he does not tell us about the price when the boll weevil struck his section. The gentleman is a fair man, and I believe he will admit on the floor of the House all I have said. It is a well-known fact. Possibly these appropriations that have been made for boll weevil have had something to do with the driving out of this pest and the renewed interest in farming. Let the good work go on. Do not cut it down. The boll weevil is making progress toward my State and other States. Do not stop the appropriations. Let us stop the boll weevil if we can before it reaches any other section or State. In answer to a gentleman on the other side who made an illustration about scientific discoveries and claiming we should stop because scientists say no progress has been made, let me say medical experts have said that you could not stop yellow fever, and yet these experts were in error.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRIBBLE. I promised to yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WICKLIFFE]. In order to hear from other gentlemen from a boll-weevil section, I yield him time.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. Mr. Chairman, I merely wanted a few minutes in order to explain these different paragraphs. I would like to say this, that I am thoroughly familiar with this question because I live, you might say, in the worst boll-weevil-infested section in the United States at this time. To give you some exact figures, the parish in which I live produced in the year 1904, which was the banner crop year of all in that parish, 22,000 bales of cotton. In 1909, when the boll weevil had reached there and commenced to do its work in earnest, our crop went down to only 1,300 bales of cotton. In 1910 it was only 410 bales of cotton. I will say, gentlemen, that I have learned by experience that what the gentleman says is absolutely correct in so far as he predicts the terrible condition of affairs.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I thank you.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. And I want to supplement it this way, that if he will labor with the rest of us and in line with the suggestion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], who has just taken his seat, he can avert, to a great extent, the dire happenings in his State which came to us, and that is—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Let the gentleman from Georgia have that five minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask that the gentleman from Georgia be given five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. Now, let me explain to my friend from Georgia the way to get at this matter, and the way to meet it is not to discredit the work of the Bureau of Plant Industry.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I did not do that.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. Then I misunderstood the gentleman. You should do all you can to get your people to believe what the demonstrator tells them is correct, get them converted to the idea that they must not look skeptically upon book farming, or that they should think, if you please, that it is book farming, because it is not book farming in the usual sense. This matter of really meeting the ravages of the boll weevil does not come under the paragraph which the gentleman now seeks to amend, but under the paragraph on page 22, "for the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton boll weevil." Here is what is done under the latter paragraph, and it is the only sensible and practical way of meeting boll-weevil conditions. It is for the demonstrator to go among the people and make the demonstration in each and every county as the late lamented Dr. Knapp caused same to be made, and which work his able successor, Mr. Bradford Knapp, is continuing. Everybody in this House knows that the farmer is skeptical in that he does not take to book farming, so called. Now, how was this condition met? The late Dr. Knapp evolved the idea of going, or sending demonstrators, among them and making a demonstration in each county or parish, as the case might be. He let that man stay there; he let the farmers in that section see the demonstration and follow the directions of that demonstrator. The information was given to the farmers direct. They saw the practical illustration that the man who followed the instructions raised cotton, and the man who did not failed to raise cotton successfully. There were the two farmers side by side. There was one farmer who agreed to do what the demonstrator said, and he raised cotton successfully, and also other diversified crops. There was another farmer, and he would not do what the demonstrator said, and he did not raise the cotton successfully, nor other crops. What is the result? The result is that after a while, a year or two, the farmers who did not follow the instructions at first commence to follow them, and the result is in that way they are recovering to a great extent from the greatest calamity that has ever befallen the cotton farmers of the South.

Mr. TRIBBLE. And why did you cut down the appropriation?

Mr. WICKLIFFE. I was not a member of the subcommittee on that appropriation, but in regard to the item the gentleman is inquiring about I will say to him he is on the wrong page.

Mr. TRIBBLE. That is what I want to know.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. This subappropriation has been reduced from $350,000 to $332,950, a decrease of $17,000. Of this amount $9,560 covers the transfer of nine employees to the statutory roll; $480 has been transferred from the subappropriation for western agricultural extension, and $7,000, covering an item for rent, has been transferred to the special appropriation for that purpose. So that you will see, so far as that is concerned, there is practically no cut there. As far as I am concerned, I would like to make it $500,000.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I am with you on that.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. It is simply because the subcommittee on Appropriations did not make the increase. I am not criticizing them. I was not a member of the subcommittee. Therefore I am not responsible for it not being increased, and I want to make it plain to the gentleman that I wish to add my approval of the good common-sense talk that was made here a moment ago by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS]. What I want to do is to get the farmers educated up to the idea that this weevil is coming, but that when it does come, if they follow in the wake of the Agricultural Department, follow in the light of what Dr. Knapp has taught, they can meet it, and will not be hurt as we were, who were skeptical and would not see it in time.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I call for the regular order.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Has my time expired, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. LAMB. This is not the paragraph that the gentleman from Texas wishes to talk upon. I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] withdrawn?

Mr. TRIBBLE. I withdraw that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, first, on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that it be read, so that the committee can understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, line 25, strike out the words "thirty-one thousand" and insert "thirty-three thousand six hundred and seventy."

Mr. MANN. Just a moment, Mr. Chairman. The amendment which I offered was to insert "thirty-three thousand six hundred and seventy," and I did not wish to increase the amount to cover the transfer. What was the actual reduction in this appropriation, regardless of the transfer?

Mr. LAMB. The actual reduction was $1,380.

Mr. MANN. Then the amount which was stated by me should have been $33,300.

Mr. LAMB. One thousand three hundred and eighty dollars covers the transfer.

Mr. MANN. I ask to modify the amendment so that it will read "$33,300."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be so modified.

There was no objection.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas address the House for five minutes on the paragraph.

Mr. MANN. He has the right to move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion has been made and withdrawn. The motion to strike out the last two words would be in order.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

What I want to say will not create any friction or discussion, but I want particularly the attention of my friend from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], because I think I know something about this boll-weevil condition, that ought to be known by cotton farmers, that will induce in one particular a practice just the reverse of what the gentleman from Mississippi states. If your people have been advised to widen your rows and increase the distance between cotton stalks in the drill, you have been, I feel sure, advised absolutely wrong. My county and my district and my own farm land was hard hit by the boll weevil.

Our people in meeting the boll-weevil conditions first secured as small growing stalk as possible and as early a fruiting variety as possible, then narrowed their rows, and as a result the cotton did not grow so tall. They made a very early planting and increased the number of stalks in the drill, with the idea that they would make the crop before the time that the boll weevil came. Their idea was that if they had more stalks in the ground and got a few bolls on each stalk before the weevil came in force they would make at least some crop. That is the sum and substance of the lesson learned by experience in those sections where the boll weevil prevails. I may add one thing more, they have learned that the more often and the later they stir their ground and their cotton stalks the better their crops.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It is not the judgment of the experts of the Agricultural Department, and it is not the testimony of the farmers who have written to me and whose letters I will put into the RECORD—and their name is legion.

Mr. HARDY. For that reason I want to put in the RECORD, for the benefit of the farmers who may be interested, my own experience, knowledge, and observation.

Mr. COLLIER. Will the gentleman yield for one moment?

Mr. HARDY. Certainly.

Mr. COLLIER. It is a matter on which we are all united as to the general purpose of the proposition. Does the gentleman mean to say that he believes that cotton planted close together, where it is difficult for the sun to strike it on all sides like it does when cotton is planted far apart, will mature earlier?

Mr. HARDY. I am discussing this question for the benefit of men just like my friends from Mississippi, Mr. HUMPHREYS and Mr. COLLIER, and these gentlemen from Georgia and Louisiana and South Carolina, for the reason that in my country we had that very question up for discussion. And I will give you a little experience.

Following that suggestion of having wide rows, far apart, I planted 10 acres of cotton, and I did not get a good stand with what I did plant. The cotton did not average more than a stalk to 10 feet in the drill and the rows were 10 feet wide. It was average bottom land. Each stalk practically stood to itself. There were not five bolls to the stalk made on that cotton where the sun got all around it; in fact, we never went in to pick it; it was not worth it.

Now, it should be remembered that the boll weevil is a sun insect, and I want the gentlemen around me to pay some particular attention to the facts I am going to relate. Before the boll weevil struck our country, if you wanted a prize stalk of cotton you went to the end of the row or some outside row, or selected some isolated stalk of cotton. It was fruited down to the ground and up to the top. But after the boll weevil came in full force in my country these isolated stalks or stalks at the end of the row had nothing on them. It is the same thing to-day wherever the boll weevil has made his appearance in full vigor.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. HARDY. With pleasure.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I would like to say this, that where you gentlemen live in different parts of the country, and are so much at variance with each other as to the different circumstances of your trouble about the boll weevil, is it not all the more important that we should have these appropriations increased for other sections?

Mr. HARDY. I am not discussing the appropriation. I want the appropriation. I think every recommendation of the department except the one for wider rows and fewer stalks in the drill has been of great benefit. With the hope of practical benefit, I am giving my views as to how best to meet the ravages of the boll weevil.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a slight extension of time in order that I may proceed along these lines, because I am trying to discuss something that may be of value to the farmers.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Texas, and I move that at the end of that five minutes all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto shall be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] is recognized for five minutes more. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] moves that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in five minutes. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I want to say—

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman from Indiana just permit me to conclude what little I have to say? I have made very full investigation of this subject on a plantation that I have myself, and I made some important discoveries. First I found that at the end of the row, where the sun played all the time, the stalk had little or no cotton on it at all. Another discovery I made was that the isolated stalks had no cotton on them, and another thing I found was that where the cotton grew high and rank and made it very shady between the rows, the late cotton was all made down low in that shade. Sometimes it happened that the stand in different rows was some bad and some good or perfect.

Now, I found that where two rows in rich land ran along together with perfect stand, say a stalk to every 18 inches, and the rows just outside these had skips, long skips, on the outside of these two good rows there would be no cotton, but on the inside, the shady side—that is, between the two rows—there would be cotton. I investigated that matter myself, and then in company with a number of farmers I went over this same bottom tract of land for the purpose of showing the facts I have related, and I want to tell you gentlemen that if you want to make cotton in a boll-weevil district, where the boll weevil first strikes you, and I think they are worse the second or third year after they strike a district, do not lessen the number of stalks and do not widen your rows, but get as many stalks as you can on the ground, and select as early a maturing variety of cotton as you can find, and make your crop before the boll weevil strikes you.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. HARDY. Yes.

Mr. CANDLER. That may be very good in regard to the boll weevil striking you the first time, but is it not a fact that in the greatest amount of dampness the boll weevil prospers the most, and is it not a fact also—

Mr. HARDY. Let me answer that question first. I will not have much time to answer anything else. When the boll weevil is first laid in the square he is a tender larva or worm, and if the square is taken from the stalk and covered up with hot earth, you kill him; if he is not killed he hatches into a weevil. The first issue of boll weevil is not numerous. He punctures the small squares—one weevil punctures many squares—and lays the egg that, if allowed, makes a multiplied crop of weevils. In the early season you want to shake off as many of these young squares containing the worm as you can and bury them in the sand or hot earth, which, I think, kills them. Just for those who do not understand I will state that what we call a square is the first beginning of a cotton bloom, which develops into the cotton boll. Now, when a weevil punctures a square, that square dies instantly, and the next day it flares open and turns yellow and is easily shaken from the stalk, so that every time the plowman drives his team and plow through this pest-stricken young cotton he knocks off and covers many of these weevil-bearing squares. Now, when the weevil hatches out he is a sun-loving insect, and he hunts the top and sunny places on the cotton plant to engage in his work of destruction, and after he is come in full force you will see no more blooms on the top of the cotton. I have seen a whole hundred acres on which not one bloom could be seen on top of a stalk, but at the bottom the blooms were numerous. You could not see anything at all on the top, but if you looked down near the ground you would find the blooms there were untouched. That is because the weevil, as soon as he comes to life, gets into the sun. He strikes the bolls on the top first, and then, maybe, finally goes down to the lower branches and shaded blooms, but I believe he very rarely goes down into the shade to puncture squares or bolls as long as there is a square or boll he can puncture that is in the sunlight.

Mr. CANDLER. Cotton is a hot-weather plant, and necessarily it takes hot weather to make the cotton grow. In order to make the plant progress satisfactorily is it not necessary to turn on a little sunshine?

Mr. HARDY. Yes. But if you would kill the weevil when it gets into the worm form you must take him and bury him in the hot ground, and this is done by frequent plowing and stirring when the cotton is comparatively small.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the discussion of this subject among the Members from the cotton-growing States in itself exhibits the urgent necessity of continuing in the Department of Agriculture the demonstration of the cultural methods of growing cotton. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDY. I am in favor of this appropriation. I simply wanted to warn my colleagues not to act in accordance with the ideas of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] and diminish the number of their cotton stalks on the ground.

Mr. LEVER. Of course the gentleman from Texas understands that this is not the item that covers the great work of the department with reference to the boll weevil?

Mr. HARDY. Yes; I understand. But I wanted to put in the Record this statement which I have given, which I think is good advice and may be of value to our farmers who grow cotton.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TRIBBLE and Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 27, noes 14.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOP. I offer the following amendment as a new paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Insert, at the end of line 25, page 19, the following as a new paragraph:

"For the investigation and control of diseases, insects, and worms affecting corn culture, the sum of $50,000."

Mr. LAMB. I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, by far the most important agricultural industry in this country is the raising of corn. In 1909 the corn crop of this country was worth $1,500,000,000. In 1910 the corn crop of this country was worth $1,720,000,000. Your cotton crop in 1909 was worth $825,000,000, and in 1910 it was worth $920,000,000. The corn crop of this country is worth nearly double the value of any other crop produced in the country. Yet there is less attention paid to the investigation of the diseases, the insects, and the worms that injuriously affect the cultivation of the corn crop than any other crop of this country. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] said that in the State of Georgia last year they produced 100 bushels of corn to the acre, which realized $65 an acre to the farmer who raised that crop. Yet no appropriation has been made to investigate and to eliminate the diseases that affect the production and culture of this valuable crop, the most valuable product of our farms. I hope that this amendment will be adopted, so that the attention of the department will be especially directed to the investigation of insects and other causes injurious to corn culture.

In many of the States of the Union the ravages of insects year after year have practically destroyed in some localities the crops. Yet in spite of these ravages more of the country is adapted to and engaged in the production of corn than any other product, and it is producing more wealth to the country than any other crop. Of all the crops raised on the farms of this country corn is king. Yet less attention has been given by the department to this subject than to the culture of any other crop. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will assist me in this movement, because his State is one of the greatest corn-producing States in the Union.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Gladly.

Mr. MANN. I understood from the reading of the amendment—and I ask for information—that it is for the purpose of studying insects.

Mr. CULLOP. Diseases, insects, and worms. Last year the wireworm was one of the most injurious enemies of the corn crop.

Mr. MANN. I fully appreciate the need of the study, but I suggest to the gentleman that the study of corn worms and other worms injurious to corn does not belong to the Bureau of Plant Industry, but to the Bureau of Entomology, and that we already have an appropriation in another item of the bill, which might be increased, for the investigation of insects affecting various crops. That item is found on page 56 of the bill, and is as follows:

For investigations of insects affecting cereal and forage plants, $50,000, of which sum $10,000 shall be immediately available.

The Bureau of Entomology is the place where that study belongs.

Mr. CULLOP. Yes; but this amendment is pertinent here, because it applies to the investigation of the diseases of corn. That is the reason why it becomes pertinent at the place where it is offered. That is the reason why I made the investigation of diseases affecting corn culture the leading feature of the amendment.

Mr. MANN. If it is for the study of diseases under the Bureau of Plant Industry, that is one thing, but I think it is quite certain that one of the studies that the department is now carrying on in the Bureau of Entomology is the study of insects that are injurious to corn.

There are various insects that eat off the roots of the corn so that it blows over and destroys the corn when it is young. That study has been carried on by the Bureau of Entomology, and I think the appropriation ought to be increased. This bill proposes to make $10,000 immediately available so as to carry out the work further for this year. It is not desirable to cross lines in these things.

Mr. LAMB. No; because you will duplicate the work.

Mr. CULLOP. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the insect affecting the culture of corn is so involved or connected with the subject of the disease of the corn that it is pertinent and proper to introduce this amendment here, because the study of one necessarily involves the study of the other. The two are so interwoven and connected that it would be almost impossible to investigate one without the investigation of the other at the same time.

Mr. LEVER. Let me say to the gentleman that we are dealing as the gentleman from Illinois has said—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I ask an extension of five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. LEVER. I want to call the gentleman's attention to lines 7, 8, and 9 on page 19:

For investigations of plant diseases and pathological collections, $22,930.

I desire to say that under that authority the Bureau of Plant Industry can do and is doing in a way the work which the gentleman has in mind. As far as the investigation of insects affecting corn is concerned, that is being carried as the gentleman from Illinois points out, on page 56, lines 12 to 14, an appropriation of $50,000 being made for the purpose. While I understand the importance of the gentleman's amendment, I do not believe it is necessary at all, because I am satisfied the department is doing the work now and doing it well.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I beg to disagree with the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina. This is too important a matter to the entire country and to nearly every State in it that it should be treated with such an appropriation for investigation of a subject of this magnitude as the one of $10,000 proposed. It is entirely inadequate for the magnitude and importance of the work.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. I do not think it desirable to appropriate and mix up the Bureau of Plant Industry with the Bureau of Entomology. The gentleman might change his amendment. Under the boll-weevil item the reading is "for the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton-boll weevil." That is for demonstration work. That appropriation comes under the Bureau of Plant Industry.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I will ask to modify my amendment by striking out "insects and worms." I am willing to concede that much in order to get this most important work inaugurated.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman, for I know the gentleman from Iowa must be with me on this proposition, because his is the banner State in the Union on corn.

Mr. HAUGEN. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this bill carries an appropriation of $188,000 to investigate the adoption and improvement of methods for farm management, and a large amount is devoted to corn growing. It also carries a large appropriation for the cotton-boll weevil, and the biggest part of that is used to encourage corn growing throughout the great South. As the gentleman is well aware, this item is not carried in an appropriation bill for the purpose of combating the boll weevil, but more for the purpose of demonstration and teaching the farmers of the South how to grow corn, and the most important part is the rotation of crops and intensified farming.

I wish to point out that the corn growers of this country have not been overlooked by the committee; they have been taken into consideration in considering other items where it does not specify that a certain amount should be used for the one purpose it is provided for in the bill, but left to the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture and the various bureaus how the money should be appropriated and for what purposes.

Mr. CULLOP. The objection to the plan of the gentleman from Iowa, as proposed, is that if they are using the money appropriated for the elimination of the boll weevil it is being misapplied, because Congress has specifically provided the purpose for which it should be used.

I mean too much of it. In other words, not enough of it is applied to that purpose. The growth of corn is the most important industry of the United States. The State of Iowa is the banner State of the Union. Many of these States in the South are well adapted to the growth of this valuable crop, and you will never have an overproduction of this product, because the uses and purposes of this product are being multiplied year after year, so that the demand increases rather than diminishes, and will continue to do so. I hope, therefore, that this amount will be appropriated, to be used solely and distinctly for this one purpose. I think it the most important matter to be considered in this bill. Its great importance should not be overlooked or its value underestimated, and attention should be directed to its protection and encouragement.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I want to state in a few words that there is ample provision in this bill for the investigation of all of these insect pests, the enemies of cotton, corn, oats, and whatnot; and the Committee on Agriculture has carefully considered all of these measures, and we will show in the proper place that there is ample provision for what the gentleman suggests. I hope the amendment will be voted down. I ask for a vote.

Mr. BUTLER. Did the committee appropriate all of the funds requested by the department for that purpose?

Mr. LAMB. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMB. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Corn being the largest single agricultural product in the United States, and there being a great many new enemies of corn coming up all of the time, is it not desirable to carry in the bill a specific provision and appropriation for the study of corn diseases?

Mr. LAMB. I think there is ample provision for the whole thing already carried in this bill. I do not think the corn farmer in this country is going to suffer. We are increasing the corn crop in the United States year by year.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman ought not to say that no farmer will suffer, because farmers suffer all of the time from these things. I know in my own State many places where farmers have seriously suffered from the attack of enemies to corn. Of course, I appreciate the fact that the Department of Agriculture and the local State experiment station are endeavoring to meet these enemies, and yet with a crop of 3,000,000,000 bushels of corn I think we could well afford to be, not liberal—we do not ask liberality—but fairly conservative about expending money to protect it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CULLOP) there were—ayes 18, noes 23.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For crop technological and fiber plant investigations, $10,010.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out the word "ten," in line 5, page 20, and insert in lieu thereof the word "sixteen."

The CHAIRMAN. There are two "tens" in that line.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. The second time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 20, line 5, strike out the word "ten" where it occurs the second time in the line and insert in lieu thereof the word "sixteen."

Mr. RODDENBERRY. Mr. Chairman, not having the information as to the necessity or reason for a decrease in the item for crop technological and fiber plant investigations, I would inquire why the reduction is made?

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, there has been no decrease at all. This appropriation was last year for $10,610. It is reduced to $10,010, a decrease of $600, due to the transfer of one employee to the statutory roll.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigating the ginning, handling, grading, baling, and wrapping of cotton, and the establishment of standards for the different grades thereof, and for carrying into effect the provisions of law relating thereto, $26,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making an inquiry as to why this appropriation is decreased. Is this a transfer?

Mr. LAMB. This subappropriation has been reduced from $32,350 to $26,000, a decrease of $6,350. Of this sum the committee cut out $2,180 in the interest of economy and $3,420 is due to the transfer of five employees to the statutory rolls and $750 covers the transfer of an item for rent to a special appropriation for that purpose. That is all there is in it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 9, the word "twenty-six" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty-eight," so as to leave the appropriation what it was before.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 20, line 9, strike out the word "twenty-six" at the end of the line and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty-eight," so that it will read "and for carrying into effect the provisions of law relating thereto, $28,000."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, that would leave the amount carried practically the same that is now authorized by law, taking into consideration the transfer of employees from one roll to another. This item is for investigation of the ginning, handling, grading, baling, and wrapping of cotton, and the establishment of standards for the different grades thereof. The question of the grades of cotton is a very important matter, and I do not think we can afford to cut off $2,000 from the appropriation for that purpose. I do not believe there is any demand for it. I am perfectly willing that the gentlemen in control of the House shall cut down various appropriations—Army and Navy and departmental appropriations in various items—but I have always advocated on the floor of this House liberal appropriations for the Agricultural Department. Undoubtedly much money is expended by the department where no return of value comes, but taking it as a whole I do not believe there is an appropriation made by any government where as much value comes from it as the appropriations made for our own Agricultural Department. This work is of benefit not only to the people who produce, but to the people who consume. My personal interest and official interest is not in the protection of those who raise cotton or handle cotton, but in those who consume cotton in the final goods that are made from cotton. We have had a great many complaints, very properly probably, in relation to the handling of cotton in the market, and the establishment of grades for cotton by the Department of Agriculture, as I am led to believe, has been of inestimable benefit to those who handle cotton, both as buyers, producers, purchasers, and consumers. I do not see any occasion for cutting off this amount here. It will not add an appreciable extent to a record of economy. No one in the country will know that this amount has been saved, that the total appropriations have been reduced by the reduction of this amount. We ought not to skin too closely these appropriations for the Department of Agriculture. They make good use of the money. Here is a bill that carries less than the cost of two battleships. I have frequently stated on the floor of this House I preferred to put money out of the Treasury into those lines that would produce benefits for the producers of the country rather than into battleships, and I still am of that opinion. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, let me say for the information of this House that these estimates are first made by the chiefs of the bureaus and divisions and submitted to the Secretary of Agriculture. He takes their estimates and either alters them or lowers them according to his judgment and presents them to the Committee on Agriculture. We not only go through them carefully, but we summon these gentlemen at the heads of the different bureaus and ask them questions touching these appropriations. We did it in this case, and this record, too large for me to read here, will show that we interrogated Dr. Galloway along those lines, and we came carefully, cautiously, and deliberately, to the conclusions we made in the premises. In addition to that, after Dr. Galloway had appeared before us I asked him one day to come over to my office, that I wanted to talk with him over these estimates. I asked him about this one and another one, and I asked him, "Do you think you could perform this work satisfactorily if we reduce $2,000 here and $3,000 at another place? And I want you to be careful, now, and tell me if you think the activities of your bureau will be injured or hurt at all if we make these reductions, for the reason that it is necessary in this country under the conditions of our finances to reduce where we can, and we ask you to bear your quota of those reductions." And cautious, prudent, careful, sagacious, as he is, he agreed to these reductions. In reply to the gentleman who says that it is only $2,000 I will state that it is true; but $2,000 in one of these estimates and $2,000 in another, plus $5,000 or $6,000, makes $10,000 or $12,000, and it was the aggregate which we had in mind. We came to our conclusions deliberately and calmly, and we confidently hope and believe that this committee will stand by our report. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, just a word.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak to this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the word "twenty-eight" and substituting therefor the word "thirty."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out the word "twenty-eight" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "thirty," so that the line will read: "Effect the provisions of law relating thereto, $30,000."

Mr. RODDENBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I thoroughly agree with the statement and views expressed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] relative to the increase of this appropriation. His amendment only provides to restore it to the amount that it has heretofore been.

It deals with the ginning, handling, grading, baling, and wrapping of cotton, and the establishment of uniform standards for the different grades thereof. All of these questions not only go to cheapening the production of cotton and the cheapening of the marketing of cotton, but it resultantly follows that if this can be accomplished you will cheapen the price of goods to the man who finally consumes the product. It is one peculiar provision wherein the Congress may bestow on the country great benefit by effecting economical and expeditious handling of the cotton crop. It inures at the same time to the benefit of the producer and to the benefit of the consumer.

I might state—and I will ask the privilege of revising my figures—that my best recollection is that the tare on the baling and handling of cotton costs approximately $30,000,000 a year, which, of course, is paid by the farmer.

The Department of Agriculture under this bureau has devoted much time to the matter of standardizing cotton. It goes to the handling and classification of the entire crop. In view of the criticisms we have heard in the preceding debates, I want to say with respect to this bureau, and especially in so far as the Secretary of Agriculture is concerned, that no Cabinet officer has occupied a position in the Cabinet for 20 years who enjoys more universally the confidence of the people of this country than the present Secretary of Agriculture. I take no part in the controversy between him and his subordinates. In those with whom he has had a controversy I have confidence, especially in Dr. Wiley. The people of the country have confidence in Dr. Galloway and his administration of this department; and I see from the report of the committee that the appropriations for the Bureau of Plant Industry for this year under this bill are $9,000 less than the estimates from that department. And the proposition I make is only to increase the appropriation for the farmers' protection by $4,000. The proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes it only $2,000.

I am not in antagonism to the bill reported by this committee. It manifests caution and patience and looks to the good of the country, and I gladly support them. Where they think it is proper to economize I am usually in accord with them, but I would like the committee to take such a position on these questions as to let Dr. Galloway and the head of the other bureaus know when they go to make up the estimates for these investigations for the benefit of agriculture, which is the basis of the wealth of the country, that it is not necessary for them to trim, to shift, and to fear that the Congress, or this House at least, will not support them in liberal estimates and in all these regards.

I hope the committee will adopt my amendment; but if not, that it will support the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose both amendments. The reduction made by the committee in this item amounts to $2,180. I am as much interested in this item, carrying as it does the authority for investigations of ginning, handling, grading, baling, and a wrapping of cotton, and the establishment of standards for the different grades thereof, as either the gentleman from Illinois or the gentleman from Georgia. I had some part a few years ago in putting this item in the bill. But the chairman of the committee has set out the situation ably and earnestly. We have come to Congress, many of us, on a platform calling for reductions in governmental expenditures—

Mr. TRIBBLE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LEVER. Let me make my statement, and I will yield at the close. It is not expected of us that we should come here and emasculate the work of the Department of Agriculture, a department dealing with the greatest fundamental industry in the world. But it is expected of us that the committee charged with the duty of recommending appropriations for this department should make careful inquiry into the necessity of them for these various items.

The Committee on Agriculture, while not paying a great deal of attention to the little matters, such as minor clerical places, have been very diligent in endeavoring to find out, in the best way we could, how much we could reduce these appropriations without hurting anything seriously. As the chairman has suggested, Dr. Galloway himself, a cautious and conservative man, and in my judgment one of the ablest men in the Department of Agriculture, whose bureau is doing one of the greatest works of any bureau in the department, sat down with the subcommittee which made up this bill, and we interrogated him upon every item. And while perhaps he did not desire any decrease in his appropriations at all, he was fair and candid enough with the committee, as he always is, to say that, "On this proposition here, gentlemen, I think I might stand a 6 per cent reduction," or, "On this proposition I think I might stand a 5 per cent reduction," or, "On this other proposition I think I might stand a 10 per cent reduction." And in each and every case we took the final judgment of Dr. Galloway on these various propositions.

This is an item of some concern to us in the South, but I want to call the attention of my friend from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERRY] to the fact that the work that has been carried on under this item with reference to the establishment of standards of different grades of cotton, and the like of that, has been worked out practically; the standards have already been established. The only expense at all now is in getting these grades adopted by the various commercial organizations of the country. This is an item carrying technical investigations—

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am a little interested in the gentleman's statement about the grades. I would like to ask the gentleman from South Carolina, Has that effort on the part of the Department of Agriculture had any effect whatever upon the trade, or has it in any way varied the various grades of cotton that were intimately known to the trade before that committee on grading was ever appointed?

Mr. LEVER. I am very glad the gentleman from Texas has asked that question.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I want to say to the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, that I asked one gentleman among those who came up here at the expense of the Government to make up these types, what they had done. I had known him intimately in the cotton trade for a good many years. He said they went down and made types just as any competent man in his office would do, and just exactly what the trade had been practicing and recognizing for years.

Mr. LEVER. In that respect, Mr. Chairman, permit me to say that I have seen a number of attempts to get out in a commercial way a standard for grading cotton, and—

Mr. SLAYDEN. The trade has had that always.

Mr. LEVER. And I remember in my own State some firm or concern was selling a number of these grades, and—

Mr. SLAYDEN. A number of what?

Mr. LEVER. A number of these grades.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Type samples?

Mr. LEVER. Yes; type samples; but they were covered by glass. I examined them, and, as a cotton grower, I would pronounce them absolutely worthless. But any farmer, except as to uniformity, length, and strength of staple, might take one of the grades made up by the Department of Agriculture and compare it with his own bale of cotton and ascertain whether he is selling his cotton for middling cotton or for something else.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to ask the gentleman a question, and I will yield to him time to answer it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from South Carolina may have five minutes in which to finish his statement.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman did not yield him the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Texas was granted five minutes, and that he yielded to the gentleman from South Carolina to answer a question.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman from Texas got five minutes for himself, and yielded to me to answer a question that he wished to propound.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was in error as to that.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, in addition to what I have said on this proposition, I desire to say that the standards adopted by the Government by authority of law, if adopted by the trade throughout the country, would be found of great advantage to the trade, and especially the farmer.

Mr. SLAYDEN. In that connection—

Mr. LEVER. Yes; and I want to go further and say that every cotton exchange in this country except the New York Exchange has adopted the standards.

The New York Exchange would adopt them if we would add two more grades to the nine now provided. We are so advised by the president of that exchange this morning.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I have had some intimacy with the trade, having gotten my living out of it for about 20 years. What the Government calls middling cotton, the basis of all calculations in the cotton trade, was middling cotton long before the Government ever spent a cent to bring gentlemen up here to make type samples; and what those gentlemen did when they came up here was to make precisely the types that were universally recognized by the trade. Now, whether the Government adopted them and published them broadcast as their types, and then the trade subsequently came in and said, "We accept those types," is of no importance. As a matter of fact, they made precisely the same types and precisely the same grading that were in existence before. They could not do anything else. It was impossible for them to revolutionize the trade.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the gentleman will yield to me, I will say it is true that this committee made nine grades of cotton which are now used in the Agricultural Department.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Used for what in the Agricultural Department?

Mr. HEFLIN. As samples that you can sell to anywhere in the South or in the United States, to be used to compare with the farmers' samples, as the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] has said. The difference is that the Agricultural Department has 9 grades and the New York Exchange has 28 grades.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I do not regard that as of any importance whatever, and this is no reflection on what the gentleman has said. Smith and Jones and Brown can trade in that commodity just as they please. They can call it anything they want to. I once knew an old gentleman, a commission merchant in the city of New Orleans, who handled a great deal of cotton. He classed it to suit himself and put it on his table. A broker would come in and say, "Mr. Jones"—we will call him that—"I want to buy some middling cotton." "Very well, sir; I have it in here." "But that is not middling cotton." "Oh, yes; that is my middling. You can take it or let it alone, as you please, and my price is so-and-so."

Now, the trade comes together on those things, and the making and adoption of these type samples by the Government does not affect or influence the trade at all.

Mr. LEVER. Could not the illustration which the gentleman has given be easily reversed, and the farmer say to the merchant, "This is not good middling cotton that I am selling you for which you are offering the price of 10½ cents. I have a different grade, and unless you will pay me for the grade I offer you I will take my cotton back home."

Mr. SLAYDEN. He can do it, and he always has done it.

Mr. LEVER. The trouble is that the farmer has never known what grade he had.

Mr. SLAYDEN. He has always done it. He has always insisted on his own classification. No one should take that right away from him, and no one can take it away from him.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman and myself differ very materially in our conclusions.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman can conclude what he pleases.

Mr. LEVER. I think the gentleman will agree that the average farmer does not know the small differences in grade. It takes an expert to know them.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I have had a great deal of experience, and I have never known one of them to make a mistake that was in favor of the other fellow.

Mr. LEVER. I have been one of them myself.

Mr. SLAYDEN. So have I. I have been a cotton raiser, too.

Mr. LAMB. I want to make this suggestion to my friend. I have made a mental calculation here that if we proceed at our present rate it will take 60 hours more to complete this bill. That will be about 12 days, and we will tire out the committee, and the country, and everybody else.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Being admonished by the chairman of the committee, I will yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. LAMB. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 20, in line 9, strike out the word "twenty-eight" and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty."

The CHAIRMAN. This is an amendment to the amendment. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] moved to strike out "twenty-six" and insert "twenty-eight." Then the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] moved to strike out "twenty-eight" and insert "thirty." The vote will now be taken on the amendment to the amendment, offered by the gentleman from Georgia, to strike out "twenty-eight" and insert "thirty."

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs now on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were 19 ayes and 31 noes.

Mr. MANN. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. MANN and Mr. LEVER.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 34 ayes and 47 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigating the handling, grading, and transportation of grain, and the fixing of definite grades thereof, $55,640.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee some questions in regard to this. I want to know what has been done in the way of establishing the standardization of grain by which the farmer may be able to know the real grade of his products.

Mr. LAMB. I do not think anything of any amount has been done.

Mr. CULLOP. Is there sufficient money in this appropriation to enable that work to be done?

Mr. LAMB. In answer to your question, I will quote from the hearing what Dr. Galloway said on this subject:

The CHAIRMAN. I see that this carries $55,640. Is it necessary to have that amount?

Dr. GALLOWAY. The grain business is one of the most important industries we have anything to do with.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand that; but do you really require this sum?

Dr. GALLOWAY. That is our idea. It is of vast importance. You recall that several years ago there was a very determined effort made to put through a Federal grain-inspection bill, which would have cost probably several million dollars annually, but that was finally side-tracked with the understanding that the question of grading grain should be thoroughly investigated and that the fundamental principles involved in that work should be set forth by the department to the end of guiding the private interests to make these grades. That is our present line of investigation.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the latest bureau knowledge on that? I will be asked this question and want to be prepared to answer it.

Dr. GALLOWAY. We have established a number of laboratories. One is at New Orleans, which may be taken as the type, and another at Baltimore, and so on. These laboratories work in closest cooperation with the boards of trade and other bodies interested in grain. It is customary for our men, in addition to investigational work—that is, to find out the varying quantities of moisture the grain should carry—to settle disputed points that may come up between members of the trade in matters of this kind. Our laboratory simply works out the problem and reports the results to the board of trade, and, as a rule, the board of trade abides by that conclusion.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, one of the greatest abuses that occur in the entire business operations of this country is in the grading of grain. It applies to the cotton producer as well as to the wheat and the corn and the hay and the oats producer. By the system now enforced the farmer suffers woefully. If the market goes down, the grade of the grain becomes poor. If the market goes up, the grade of the grain remains normal. That practice, participated in by the boards of trade at commercial centers where the product of the farm is bought and collected for distribution, is costing more money to the farmer to-day than anything which he has to bear, or any other class of citizens in this Government. It practically denies to him the larger markets of the country and imposes on him an expensive hardship. He is being swindled, and there ought to be established some uniform system of grading, not only of grain but all other farm products in order to protect the producer and smaller dealers. It is a matter of simple justice, nothing more.

How many cotton farmers in the South have raised as fine a product as ever grew out of the ground, and when they have undertaken to sell it directly themselves the market fell while it was in transit, and of course the cotton would not grade when it reached its destination, and the producer did not receive for it the price that it had been sold for.

Mr. LAMB. On that point will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. LAMB. To show you that we are thinking along the same line, I want to read a little further from the hearings as to what Dr. Galloway said:

The CHAIRMAN. This is very interesting; the standards are watched with a great deal of interest, but have they been accepted?

Dr. GALLOWAY. Yes. Another important feature has to do with our export grain trade—with the methods of shipping corn. Foreign buyers are complaining that our corn is being poorly handled. It is frequently moist, and when it reaches the other side it is hot. One or more of the Atlantic ports has had a very serious trouble with foreign shipments; and we have made a good many investigations of such shipments, all to the end that people handling corn at such points may introduce such measures as will enable them to protect themselves, and also protect the foreign buyers who are to receive the corn.

Mr. CULLOP. I would rather the gentleman would not read any farther in my time, but he can read the balance in his own time. I want to use mine on this subject. This injurious practice has been worked upon the farmer a little bit too long in this country. Always something occurs to his product when he gets it to the market to affect the quality, and he must suffer because he has no other alternative. The trouble about that is that while they have been making that investigation they have not been establishing proper safeguards and rules to protect the farmer upon that subject. It is action that is needed in this matter, speedy and prompt action.

The condition is such to-day that the farmer can not sell his grain abroad or in large market centers, but he must sell them through the middleman, because if he sells them directly, ships them to the market, he is graded out of the market and largely out of the price of his product. What is true of wheat and corn and oats and barley is likewise true of your cotton in the South. I insist that proper steps now should be taken to standardize the grades of farm products so that the grade may be fixed at the point where he delivers his products for shipment and not at the point of destination, as the custom now does, and that the grade so fixed at the receiving point shall control throughout until its character is changed. Then fluctuating markets could not be the cause leading to the change of the grade. This would do justice to the producer and the small dealer. It would create faith in the honesty of traders and tend to maintain stable markets. There is a widespread demand, a necessity existing, for the establishment of such a system as that for which I contend, and I sincerely hope I can prevail on the department to adopt it or some system that will produce such a wholesome result.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, there ought to be established in this department a grading system so that the producer himself would know the standard by which his products are to be graded, and therefore could determine when he shipped his products, if he shipped them to a market distant from his home, whether or not they came within the rule laid down or the grade fixed when he parted with the possession of the same. As the system now exists, he is left in the dark and has no way of determining for himself what the grading system is four or five hundred miles away from his farm, and is often made a victim to the whims of the market juggler, so that the original producer is unable safely to market his products except through a middleman, who must have the profit that the farmer ought to have as the result of his toil and labor. Therefore, if this appropriation is not large enough for the purpose of determining what should be established in that direction as a protection to the original producer, I would like to see it increased, and it matters not how large it may be if it would answer the purpose and produce the desired result. This class has been neglected too long in this matter and are being injured every day in the year because of the system that now exists, and some improvement ought to be made in this matter for the protection of this the greatest class of producers in this country, in order that they may enjoy the fruits of their labor and because fair dealing demands such a safeguard as I here propose.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I understand from the statement of the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB], that the Department of Agriculture is doing nothing toward establishing the grades of grain. I hold in my hand some food and drug decisions that have been published by the Department of Agriculture, and I would wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that fines have been imposed for shipping grades of grain in interstate commerce which have not been approved by the Bureau of Chemistry and which have been held to be a violation of the pure-food law by the Federal courts.

The first is food and drug decision No. 107. Here we have a carload of wheat that was shipped and a sample seized by the inspector of the Bureau of Chemistry:

Adulteration was alleged because another substance, to wit, hard wheat, had been mixed with and substituted in part for No. 2 red wheat. Misbranding was alleged because said wheat was sold under the distinctive name of another article, to wit, No. 2 red wheat, when in fact it was not No. 2 red wheat, but a mixture thereof with 40 per cent hard wheat, whereby the purchaser was deceived and misled.

A mixture of hard wheat with No. 2 red was declared to be a violation of law because the grade was declared by the State local inspector to be No. 2 red wheat.

Here we have another one, food and drug decision No. 1167, adulteration of white oats:

In due course a libel was filed against the said carload of white oats, charging adulteration of the product within the meaning of the act, because it consisted of 13 per cent barley, 3 per cent weed seed, and the balance white oats.

In this instance, because 13 per cent of the grain was barley and 3 per cent was weed seed, the law was declared to be violated, as the grade was said to be white oats.

Here is another instance, food and drug decision No. 1352, issued January 25, 1912. Again it is the adulteration and misbranding of white oats:

Adulteration was alleged against said product for the reason that there had been mixed and packed with said oats a quantity of wheat, barley, and other seed, stems, hulls, chaff, and inert matter so as to reduce, lower, and injuriously affect its quality and strength, which substances had been substituted in part for said oats. Misbranding was alleged because said product was sold under the distinctive name of another article, to wit, No. 3 white oats, when the product was not such, but was a mixture of white oats, wheat, barley, and other seed, stems, hulls, chaff, and inert matter.

Mr. Chairman, I am not saying that those decisions go beyond the present law upon the statute books, but I am saying that if that is the correct interpretation of the law as it is, it means that no man can sell a carload of wheat, no man can sell a carload of oats, no man can sell a carload of grain if there is a single substance in it except pure grain of the kind which he alleges to be sold.

If a man were to sell a carload of wheat and there should happen to be a few grains of rye in it, under that decision he could be punished. If he should sell a load of oats and there should be 10 grains of barley in it, under that decision he could be prosecuted.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman mean if that amount were found, or if it were mixed with it deliberately?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I am speaking under this decision here.

Mr. MANN. And I am speaking under this decision also.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Yes; if the inspector claims to find it mixed at the time of inspection.

Mr. MANN. That is neither the decision nor the law.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. That is the decision here given.

Mr. MANN. No; the decision here is that it was mixed with it. That is the charge, that it was mixed with it. If a man has a carload of wheat and deliberately mixes with it something else and sells it as a carload of wheat he ought to be punished for it, and that is all the law does and that is all the decisions hold.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I know my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is a very good authority, and I would not want to place my judgment against his. Yet, Mr. Chairman, the allegation here is that any article that is sold as No. 3 white oats and is found upon inspection to contain other articles except white oats is misbranded because of the fact that the other substances are mixed with it. Those cases have not come to trial; the parties in defense have preferred to enter pleas of guilty and pay nominal fines; but the allegation is that the grain is misbranded because the inspector declares it to be one grade and the bureau declares that the result of their examination shows it to be another. There is no allegation of an intent to deceive by mixing the grain, but that a misbranding occurs because it is mixed. The definite result, misbranding, will follow if the local inspector fails to grade the grain properly, regardless of how the mixture or the mistake shall have been caused.

That is what this decision means. Now, I have no objection to the question of carrying out the law, but I do submit that until the United States Government takes up the question of establishing a uniform grade of grain and does establish such a grade it is beyond the province or ought to be beyond the province of any law upon the statute books whereby the farmer or any man can be prosecuted for selling grain which has been graded by local authority, but which the Federal authority condemns as being incorrect. Under that decision, if it were the fact that oats or wheat were graded correctly at Indianapolis under their rules and standard and shipped in interstate commerce, even my friend from Illinois will not assert the fact that, if in transit, if an inspector from the Bureau of Chemistry shall examine such grain and allege differently an indictment may be filed and thus bring the case into the Federal courts for adjudication.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment. I move, in line 13, page 20, to strike out the word "five" where it occurs and substitute therefor the word "seven."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 20, line 13, strike out the word "five" where it occurs and insert in lieu thereof the word "seven."

Mr. RODDENBERRY. Mr. Chairman, the effect of my amendment is to increase by $2,000 the appropriation for investigating the handling, grading, and transportation of grain.

Mr. LAMB. There is no increase there.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. No; I am moving to increase it.

Mr. LAMB. It is the same as it was before. The decrease of $1,440 is due to the transfer of two employees to the statutory rolls. That is all there is in it.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. Now, having displaced about $2,000 of it in salaries, I desire to increase it by $2,000, so that the department may use it for actual work for the farmer. I hope neither the chairman of the committee nor Members will grow impatient as we discuss items of this Agricultural appropriation bill. When the Army bill came up there was ample time—days—to consider it, but if you neglect the farmers' interest in this country you can support no Army and you will need no soldiers. In the Navy bill, which we will have in a few days, there will be days and days in the discussion of warships, battleships, and such matters, when if proper encouragement is not given to the agricultural interests of this country for its prosperity we can maintain no Navy and we will need no warships.

Mr. LAMB. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. I will not retort discourteously to the gentleman. I am not criticizing the chairman of the committee, because his action is only responsive to what seems to be the impatience of some Members for hasty disposition of the bill. The gentleman from Texas spoke somewhat disparagingly of the efforts of Dr. Galloway and his bureau toward standardizing cotton grading.

I desire to say that the department claims that it is primarily for uniformity in grades. There is no uniformity of grade in this country in practice for the man who grows and sells his own cotton. There is uniformity of grade on the exchange in New York and New Orleans, but out in the country towns of 20,000, 10,000, 5,000, and 1,000 inhabitants, where the farmer sells his cotton there is no uniformity of grade. I challenge the statement of the gentleman from Texas that the farmer fixes his grade. The grades as provided for here by the department are standardized and uniform. The standards are now placed in many agricultural schools for the farmers who are trained there, but they ought to be in every farmer's warehouse in this country, and so should the standards of every grain, so that the farmer when he sells can see a facsimile of the standard by which Savannah, New Orleans, New York, and Liverpool are grading. As it is now, the country merchant takes a sample, and there is not a standard of grades in the town, and when the buyer says it is middling, just as the cotton buyer says, the farmer must take it. I have known instances where the cotton buyer classed the cotton as middling when he bought from the farmer and sold the same cotton to a cotton factory in the same town as good middling. They rob the farmer when the bears in New York put the price down, and they often get him on undergrading again when they buy the raw staple from him.

I assert, gentlemen, that the Department of Agriculture, both in grain and cotton, is rendering a service to the man who produces the staples by his own labor and that of his children. At one time a buyer of cotton and as a producer of cotton, and familiar for 30 years with the industry in its raw state, I speak not from information derived from others, but from actual personal knowledge. "This agricultural bill, carrying these provisions, is extremely economical. The farmers have no lobby here to ask for increased appropriations. The farmers maintain no employed officers in Washington to see how much appropriation they shall have. They leave it to us; and when it comes to standing by the committee or standing by the farming industry of the country, with all respect for and every confidence in the committee, I shall stand by my judgment as to what appropriation is necessary for the encouragement and highest interests of agriculture, without regard to the product raised or the section of the country in which it is produced." [Applause.]

Mr. LAMB. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERRY] has performed faithfully and eloquently, and to-morrow the farmers of Georgia will applaud him.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. They do it already.

Mr. LAMB. Perhaps. But let me say that this is a mere practical question. We reduce this appropriation only $1,400, which was by a transfer from a lump sum, and the gentleman's eloquence is "wasted on the desert air." I ask for a vote.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I understood the chairman of the committee in reading the testimony of Dr. Galloway before the committee as to these cotton grades, to say that he asked Dr. Galloway if these grades had been accepted, and he said yes.

Mr. LAMB. I do not recall that exactly.

Mr. HEFLIN. Now, the fact is, Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, these grades have not been accepted by the New York Cotton Exchange. But the New Orleans Cotton Exchange has accepted these grades, I understand.

Mr. LEVER. That is what I said, if the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] will permit.

Mr. LAMB. And if he will further permit, these grades have been officially adopted as a basis of their operations by nine cotton exchanges and the New England Buyers' Association, and the Arkwright Club have agreed to make them the basis of all their purchases.

Mr. HEFLIN. Nine cotton exchanges have adopted these 9 grades established by the act of Congress, the samples of which are now on exhibition in the Department of Agriculture, to be sold and distributed throughout the South for the purpose of educating the local buyers and the farmers themselves what grade his cotton is without having to wait until he ships a thousand bales of cotton to be graded at Montgomery, Ala., or some other city. There is no doubt in my mind but that these grades are accomplishing a great deal of good, but the New York Cotton Exchange has 28 different grades, and there are not 28 different grades of cotton. These 9 grades in the Agricultural Department now cover all grades of cotton, and they ought not to be permitted to use 28 different grades and beat the farmer out of millions of money, as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERRY] has said they now do. And I am glad that these exchanges have adopted these 9 grades, and I hope that the New York Exchange will adopt them. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERRY].

Mr. MANN. Let the amendment be read again.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 20, line 13, strike out the word "five" where it occurs and insert in lieu thereof the word "seven."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. LAMB. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 22, noes 25.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the investigation and improvement of grains and methods of grain production, $75,765.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. JACOWAY). The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the word "sixty" in line 5 and insert the word "seventy," and add the following after the word "dollars": "Provided, That $10,000 of said sum shall be used exclusively for improving corn-culture methods."

Mr. CULLOP. Now, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order, of course, on that. Before proceeding let me say to the gentleman that this appropriation has been reduced from $77,925 to $75,765, a decrease of $2,160, which is due entirely to the transfer of three employees to the statutory roll. So we stood pat on that proposition.

Mr. CULLOP. I should have moved to strike out the word "seventy" and have made it "eighty." I wish to modify the amendment by striking out the word "seventy" and making it "eighty," so that it will read "eighty-five thousand."

Mr. LEVER. So that the amendment will read, how?

Mr. CULLOP. In line 4, page 21, strike out the word "seventy" and insert the word "eighty," and then in line 5, add, after the word "dollars," "Provided, That $10,000 of this sum shall be used exclusively to improve the methods of corn culture."

On that I want to be heard. I ask $10,000 now for that specific purpose. I understand you must get a start in this matter in order to accomplish anything, and I am directing my efforts to that end.

As I said before on this proposition, this is in aid of the production of the most important product to the people of this country. Now, with all due deference to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, I do not believe that this committee, when it understands the methods of making up this bill, will quite agree with the methods of the procedure used. And I know there is always a disposition to stand by the committee. But, gentlemen, let me say this to you, when you are doing that you are in danger of making this a one-man Congress if the rule is followed out fully in all things. [Applause.] I am opposed to the one-man business, and hope the system will not find a footing in this body.

Mr. LAMB. There are 20 men on the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. CULLOP. Oh, yes; but let me get through, with all due deference to the gentleman. He says they took a member of the department, found out what was wanted, and as a rule accepted his recommendations.

Mr. LAMB. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. CULLOP. I hope I am; but, if I correctly understood him a moment ago, that seemed to be the plan pursued; and if it was then it is not Congress that is making this bill, but it is the department that is making it, and I do not know whether we agree in all things with the methods of the department or as to the course of procedure. Some of us may differ with it, and properly so.

Now, this is the most important industry in the United States, realizing more money to the people than any other industry in the United States, and it is suffering as much or more to-day from the ravages of the enemies to the growth of corn than any other product in the United States, the cotton crop not excepted, because the production of corn is more extensive. The extent of the territory employed in it is larger. It reaches out for the benefit of more people in the country than any other industry in the country, and more people are engaged in it. I do believe that it would be justice to the men who are engaged in this industry that something be started in order to relieve them from the pests which prey upon the fruits of their labor and in many instances make it a complete loss, and thereby affecting the welfare of the whole country.

I hope that this amendment, which is reasonable, will be adopted and that the additional sum proposed be appropriated for that purpose and applied solely to that purpose. I hope the chairman of the committee will accept this amendment, as I believe he ought to. I believe the country would approve it if he did.

Mr. CANDLER. Would the gentleman be satisfied with $10,000 of an appropriation to carry on the work?

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to have it five times as much.

Mr. CANDLER. Then if the department is spending more than that the gentleman is gratified, I presume?

Mr. CULLOP. No. If they are using it, they are not using it now perhaps as profitably as they could.

Mr. CANDLER. When you are limiting it to $10,000, you can depend upon it that they will not expend more than $10,000. They are expending more than that now, and the gentleman does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, it is all right to be economical, and I approve all efforts in that direction. I notice there was an attempt to raise the salaries of clerks. Here is the place to raise the appropriation, so that the real producers can get the benefit of it. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I fully agree with the gentleman from Indiana—

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me just a moment? I would like to ask leave to extend my remarks on the subject I spoke of before.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I couple with that request a request that I shall have leave to extend my remarks also. My request is that both the gentleman from Texas and myself may have leave to extend our remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has asked unanimous consent that he be allowed to extend his remarks in the Record.

Mr. MANN. No, Mr. Chairman; I asked that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] and myself both be allowed to extend our remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The request of the gentleman from Illinois is that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] and himself be allowed to extend their remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

Mr. HEEFLIN. On this subject?

The CHAIRMAN. On the subject discussed to-day.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Chairman, as to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I object. As to the gentleman from Texas, on the other side [Mr. HARDY], I do not object. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I preferred my request for that very purpose. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. AKIN of New York. I know it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I shall not permit such a distinction to be made.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] asks leave to extend his remarks.

Mr. MANN. For the present, Mr. Chairman, I shall not permit that the gentleman shall take the position that on this side of the House no Member shall have leave to extend remarks, and that Members on that side, with whom he is friendly, shall be allowed that privilege. I can not permit that distinction, and for the present I shall have to object.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I move that the gentleman from Illinois be permitted to extend his remarks in the Record.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Chairman, when gentlemen on that side of the House make a distinction in regard to unanimous consents, I am entitled to do it too.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion before the House is the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP]—

Mr. CULLOP. No, Mr. Chairman; I asked unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] be permitted to extend his remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will advise the gentleman from Indiana that that has been objected to.

Mr. CANDLER. The gentleman from Iowa was addressing the House, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] is recognized to proceed.

Mr. HAUGEN. I fully agree with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] that the subject to which he has addressed himself is of great importance. We know, of course, that the corn product of the United States is in dollars and cents of greater value than the cotton crop, and that the product of wheat is equal to that of cotton; and when we speak of the importance of fixing standards one should be provided for as much as the other. But I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the Committee on Agriculture has recommended $2 for this purpose where they have recommended $1 for fixing standards of cotton. However, I did not rise to discuss that subject, but to say that the Committee on Agriculture have absolute confidence in the Secretary and in everyone connected with the department, and we have preferred to make lump appropriations, leaving it to the discretion of the Secretary and the chiefs of the various bureaus, in order that they may determine how and where this money shall be expended. We believe that they, taking into consideration the importance of all problems confronting them, will use the money where they believe it can be used to the best advantage. We have provided not only $10,000 for the investigation and encouragement of corn growing, but this bill carries an item of $186,000 and another item of $330,000, or more than $500,000 all told, which can be used to encourage corn growing in this country and to carry on the investigations and work that have been suggested by the gentleman from Indiana. [Applause.]

Mr. LEVER. I ask for a vote, Mr. Chairman, on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

The question being taken on the amendment, on a division (demanded by Mr. CULLOP) there were—ayes 25, noes 28.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the investigation and improvement of tobacco and the methods of tobacco production and handling, $24,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] a question. I would like to know why this appropriation was reduced.

Mr. LAMB. It has been reduced from $26,630 to $24,000, a decrease of $2,630. This decrease was made by the committee in the interest of economy.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This is an actual reduction of the former appropriation?

Mr. LAMB. This is one of the various items that I referred to this morning. We asked Dr. Galloway to come before us, and we asked him if he could not reduce this 4 or 5 per cent, and in some cases 6 per cent. He thought no serious injury would result to this investigation, and that no inconvenience at all would be caused by such a reduction, and that is the reason we reduced it.

Mr. TURNBULL. Was there any unexpended balance of this amount left over?

Mr. LAMB. I think not.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I desire to withdraw my pro forma amendment and to offer an amendment striking out "twenty-four thousand" and inserting "twenty-six thousand six hundred and thirty."

Mr. LAMB. Unless the gentleman wishes to make some remarks, I will ask for a vote.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to submit some remarks on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 21, in lines 7 and 8, strike out "twenty-four thousand" and insert in lieu thereof "twenty-six thousand six hundred and thirty."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with every movement in the interest of economy, but I am not in sympathy with a movement which has for its effect the reduction of an appropriation formerly made and carried in this bill for the purpose of relieving and benefiting the farmers of this country. These appropriations have been made in the past and the farmers have derived great benefit from them. They have the right to expect that this Congress will continue these appropriations in their interest, and for my part I would rather see a less number of salaries raised, I would rather see the force, if necessary, reduced in the department, than to see the money taken from the farmers for whose benefit this bill is supposed to be framed. I want to appeal to the committee in the interest of fairness to adopt this amendment.

This bill carries two appropriations for the investigation of the production and best methods of handling grain, amounting in the aggregate to over $135,000. You heard the chairman of this committee say a moment ago that neither of these appropriations had been reduced. There was an apparent slight reduction in both figures, but he explained to the committee that it was not a real reduction, but that the apparent reduction results from the fact that some of the clerical force charged with the handling of that fund have been transferred to the statutory roll.

I want to call attention to another fact, that in addition to the appropriation of $330,000 for the destruction or prevention of the boll weevil there are two appropriations for the investigation of the production and best methods of handling cotton, aggregating over $54,000.

And yet the bill of last year only carried $26,630 for the investigation and improvement of tobacco and its production. For two years I have been endeavoring to get the Department of Agriculture to send to the district I have the honor to represent a man for the purpose of making these investigations in the interest of the tobacco producers of that section of the country.

We have in Tennessee and Kentucky probably 100,000 acres of land upon which dark tobacco is grown. There is no man, so the department informs me, who can be spared to go into that particular section to give attention to this great industry. As a matter of fact, they have been compelled, so the gentleman in charge of this matter says, to draw upon a man who is located in the Burley district and send him down there occasionally to look into the industry and confer with the farmers who raise the dark tobacco.

[The time of Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee having expired, by unanimous consent his time was extended two minutes.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I was told by a gentleman in the Department of Agriculture that he realized that it would be beneficial to the tobacco farmers of that section to have a man there, but he said that the appropriation was not sufficient, and he expressed his regret that it was not sufficient so that he could comply with the wishes of the farmers of that section. I never dreamed that the Committee on Agriculture would in this bill undertake to reduce an appropriation which he said was not sufficient.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Does the gentleman think that the farmers of the South would appreciate this kind of economy coming from a Democratic Agricultural Committee?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Undoubtedly they will not. As I said a while ago, while I favor economy along all lines, I do not favor that supposed form of economy which will result in taking from the farmers of the South or from the farmers of any other section of this country an appropriation which they have been receiving in the past and which has proven so beneficial to them.

I want in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, to appeal to this committee in behalf of this amendment. Here is an appropriation for the tobacco farmer that has been reduced, and the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture can give no sufficient reason or explanation for it. There has been no reduction in the appropriation for the production and handling of grain. There has been no reduction in the appropriation with reference to cotton; yet here is a great industry, the growing of tobacco, grown as it is in 20 great States of this Union, as to which, in the interest of economy, the committee say, and for no other reason, there has been a reduction of $2,630 from the current appropriation. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB], the chairman of the committee, says that Dr. Galloway has said that this appropriation can be reduced without injury. I want to say that that is not the information that I have received—not from Dr. Galloway, but from the man who is charged with the investigation and the handling of this appropriation. I hope the committee will adopt the amendment.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]. I would call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in view of the statement made by him that for two years he has been trying to get a man to go into his district and make an investigation with reference to tobacco and the methods of tobacco production, culture, and handling, and has been unable to do it on account of lack of appropriation provided by Congress, the gentleman by his amendment has not relieved the situation at all, because he seeks to put the appropriation in exactly the same form that it has been for the last two years.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. My purpose in offering to restore the appropriation to what it formerly was is because of the fact that I realize the committee is not in a temper to increase these appropriations; but I hope that if this appropriation is put back where it was last year and where it ought to be next year, possibly the farmers that I have the honor to represent and those in the adjoining districts may get some benefit from it.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman refers to the fact, also, that nowhere in the bill is there carried any further item for the investigation of tobacco diseases and pests. I desire to call his attention to the item to be found on page 56, under the Bureau of Entomology, which reads as follows:

For investigations of insects affecting southern field crops, including the cotton-boll weevil and other insects injurious to cotton, insects affecting tobacco, rice, and sugar cane, the Argentine ant, and life history studies of ticks, $35,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And the gentleman has cut that appropriation 25 per cent.

Mr. LEVER. It is true that we have cut that appropriation, but it was cut with a distinct understanding that the statement would be made upon the floor that some of the work of the department in reference to the study of the life history of the cattle tick and cotton-boll weevil should be somewhat curtailed and reduced. I have here in my hand, Mr. Chairman, furnished me by the very capable assistant clerk of the Committee on Agriculture, a reference to the project of the Department of Agriculture touching tobacco, and find one of its new projects to be:

Tennessee: Tobacco investigation, new project, appropriation, $2,000.

That amount was to be set aside from this fund for the very purpose covered by the proposed amendment.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not quite understand the gentleman.

Mr. LEVER. I was making a statement, and I will repeat it for the benefit of the gentleman from Tennessee, that in the project book of the Bureau of Plant Industry there is included this item:

Tennessee: Tobacco investigation, new project, appropriation, $2,000.

Mr. MANN. Is that not a part of the original estimate?

Mr. LEVER. I am not advised as to that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And the committee has cut out that very $2,000 which the department wanted to expend in Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would much prefer to have that item in the bill than to have it in an estimate submitted by the department.

Mr. LEVER. Has the gentleman any information from any source whatever that the department, even under the reduced appropriation, is not going to work out this project?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I know they have stated to me since January 1 that they did not have money enough to go into the dark tobacco districts of Tennessee and Kentucky for the purpose of making these investigation, but were compelled to confine them to the Burley and other districts.

Mr. LEVER. That complaint came before this bill was reported from the committee, so that the department is wrong in its own information.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That statement was made under an appropriation of $26,630 for the current year. Now, if the gentleman in the next fiscal year cuts that appropriation down to $24,000, I feel quite sure I will receive the same sort of an answer when I go to them again.

Mr. LEVER. And yet in the face of that complaint the department was expecting to have this appropriation remain at the figure provided in the current law and under that figure they had provided for the appropriation for the gentleman.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will leave it at $26,630, that is all I ask; and that will give the department the funds with which to go into Tennessee as proposed in their estimates.

Mr. LEVER. I feel confident that the gentleman will get a man if he presses for him vigorously, as I am confident the gentleman will do.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Carolina may have two minutes additional. I want to get some information.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from South Carolina may be extended for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman kindly inform me for what purpose is this appropriation used and where it is used?

Mr. LEVER. I will read to the gentleman a statement furnished me by the chief of the bureau touching this very item:

The tobacco investigations are carried on at local stations maintained in the more important tobacco districts of the States of Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Kentucky, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Texas. In every State except one (in which the work is in cooperation with local agencies) the investigations are conducted in cooperation with State agencies. Laboratory problems are also taken up at headquarters in Washington.

The three general features of the work are (1) the development of improved varieties or types by breeding and selection; (2) determination by practical tests of the best methods of fertilizing the tobacco crop; (3) study of the best systems of crop rotation specially adapted to tobacco culture. Valuable new varieties have been obtained by breeding in the Connecticut Valley, in Maryland, and in Ohio.

Some of the special problems receiving attention are improvements in methods of curing cigar, burley, and flue-cured types, the control of the Granville wilt in North Carolina, and a study of the effects of soil and climatic conditions on the yield and quality of tobacco. The field investigations on these problems are supplemented by laboratory studies.

I think that gives the gentleman the information he desires.

Mr. HELM. Can the gentleman inform me what station is located in Kentucky?

Mr. LEVER. No; I can not, I am sorry to say.

Mr. HELM. What do these stations consist of?

Mr. LEVER. I presume, according to the statement made by the chief of the bureau here on this proposition, that they consist in the main of stations in the locality in which this work is being carried on, probably some laboratories, but I am not sure.

Mr. HELM. Does this man go out in the field or simply manage these stations?

Mr. LEVER. Oh, no; he goes out in the field, as I understand it, and does investigational and experimental work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. HELM. I ask that the gentleman may be given two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HELM. How has this sum of money been spent with reference to the different stations that the gentleman has enumerated?

Mr. LEVER. You mean in the amount spent?

Mr. HELM. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. It has not been furnished to me and I can not tell the gentleman.

Mr. HELM. I think it is well—

Mr. LEVER. I have the information here now. The expenditures for 1910 and 1911: Connecticut Valley tobacco investigations—I will read the round numbers—$2,638; Maryland tobacco investigations, $1,054; Kentucky tobacco investigations, $1,977; Ohio tobacco investigations, $1,630; New York tobacco investigations, $1,713; Virginia tobacco investigations, $4,854; Texas tobacco investigations, $1,688; North Carolina tobacco investigations, $2,679; Pennsylvania tobacco investigations, $1,180; South Carolina—just think of this miserable little sum of $725—

Mr. HELM. How much tobacco did you raise?

Mr. LEVER. Cooperative breeding demonstrations in Georgia, $2,596.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Did I understand the gentleman to say Tennessee was included in that list?

Mr. LEVER. No; it is not included, but the project book anticipates an appropriation of $2,000 for Tennessee.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. But the gentleman in his bill has cut out that $2,000 which the department expected to expend in Tennessee. That is exactly the point I am making.

Mr. LEVER. I do know that the complaint which came from the department to the gentleman came to him long before the committee made up this bill and before the department could have had any information at all as to whether or not the committee was going to allow the sum estimated for.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And the gentleman proposes to strike out of this bill the $2,000 which was estimated for Tennessee.

Mr. HELM. Are there any other practical results obtainable from the expenditure of this money than those you have stated?

Mr. LEVER. What I have stated is all the information I have about the subject, and of course the gentleman himself is very much more familiar with the result of this work, being in a tobacco State, than I am.

Mr. YOUNG of Kansas. I understood you to say that the department had an apparent plan or proposition as to the distribution of this fund for the coming year. Are you able to state how much is to go to any particular State?

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Kansas that the Bureau of Plant Industry always has a project book, looking to the future, so that they may know how to make up their estimates to present to Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] has expired.

Mr. YOUNG of Kansas. One further question.

Mr. LEVER. My time has expired or I would be very glad to answer.

Mr. YOUNG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for one minute.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. YOUNG of Kansas. Is the gentleman able to tell how much of this fund was expended in any particular State last year?

Mr. LEVER. I think I gave that to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] just now.

Mr. YOUNG of Kansas. How much in the State of Kansas? How many stations are there?

Mr. MANN. They do not raise it; they use tobacco in Kansas.

Mr. LEVEE. I will say that I do not see in this project book any reference to the State of Kansas, and as my friend from Illinois suggests, you do not raise tobacco out there, but just use it.

Mr. YOUNG of Kansas. My friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] does not live out there and, therefore, does not know.

Mr. MANN. I do not want to know the tobacco you raise.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

There are few products in the several States of the Union which produce tobacco that bring more revenue to the farmer than the tobacco crop. Either one of two things is true. There should be a larger appropriation for this work, and I must confess that, from the statement made by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVEE], so far as practical results are concerned, they are rather insignificant, considering the amount and the extent of the product. If it is going to be of any service or value to the farmer, it ought to be larger than it is, or else there ought to be no appropriation at all. I am unable to see any practical results which redound to the interest of the farmer from the statement made by the gentleman from South Carolina. I do, though, insist that perhaps next to corn and wheat and the hay crop the tobacco crop brings more revenue to the farmers than any of the other ones that they produce and that I have not enumerated. Large and substantial benefits can be accomplished for the farmers, not only in the tobacco business, but in every crop that they produce—experimental station work. And I am in sympathy with any movement that encourages or advances the interests of the farmer, for, as it has been frequently said on this floor, but not taken with the amount of seriousness that it deserved, the farmer is the mainstay of this country. He is the man who preserves the balance of trade for our Treasury. He is the man who in 1907 stopped the threatened panic. When the cloud of disaster loomed on the financial sky the press was full of printed matter to the effect that the farmers were able to maintain the balance of trade, restore confidence, and the country looked to the farmers for relief. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate on the original amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. MANN. Well, that is not a usual announcement for the Chairman to make. I move to strike out the last word, the last two words, or the paragraph, or whatever is necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] now proposes an amendment to restore in this bill what has heretofore been the appropriation for an investigation and improvement of tobacco and methods of tobacco production and handling, and makes what seems to be a very reasonable appeal for the restoration of the amount.

A few moments ago I offered an amendment to restore an item with reference to cotton, for the improvement of cultural methods. I did not notice the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] voting in favor of that amendment.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to say to the gentleman that I did vote for it, and I think some gentlemen here can testify to that effect.

Mr. MANN. I am very glad the gentleman did. Did the gentleman vote for the other amendment, to increase the amount for the ginning, handling, and grading of cotton?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Is that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. MANN. That was the amendment which I offered.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Was that the amendment on which tellers were demanded?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; I voted for it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's record is good, so far. I am ready to support the amendment of the gentleman, although I was under the impression that on the other votes his vote was the other way.

Ever since I have been a Member of this House I have heard gentlemen declaiming on the floor of the House how they were the farmer's friends and how the farmers should be represented in the House. I represent a city district, not dependent directly upon farming, and yet I have never opposed in the House a proposition for the benefit of the agricultural industries of the country.

It has remained for this Congress, at this later day, to endeavor to economize at the expense of the farmers and the agricultural industries. Every year since I have been a Member of this House until this year the agricultural appropriation bill has been increased from what it was in the preceding year. This year they cut off what they call "measly sums," $2,000 here and $3,000 there, which they say will make no difference in the work. And, having decided to do that, they get Dr. Galloway with them and browbeat him into saying that he can get along with what they will give him.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman will pardon me, but the Committee on Agriculture never did browbeat any man, and would not do it under any circumstances. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, when I say the gentleman from Virginia browbeats anyone, everyone will understand that I am using the word facetiously. My amiable friend could not browbeat. [Applause.] I understand how the committees deal with the officials of the Government. I have helped to do it myself, examining men as to whether they could not get along without this or that, whether they could not reduce the amount, whether they could not get along with less, and so on. No official can stand up under that kind of an examination.

I am in favor of carrying on the work of the Department of Agriculture, and if the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle choose to make a record for cheap economy by cutting off appropriations for that department which ought to be made, I can not stand with them, as I did not stand with my own side of the House in former years when gentlemen on that side offered amendments to increase the appropriations for the cotton boll weevil investigation and for other investigations. I am perfectly willing to stand for economy in most branches of the Government and have endeavored to do so.

But when the gentlemen say that in this particular item Dr. Galloway and his assistants can do as much good work with $24,000 as they can with $26,000, they know that that can not be true. If Dr. Galloway or his assistants are wasting the money, they ought not to have it. If they are not wasting the money, they ought to have what is necessary to do this work. We can afford it. The condition of the Treasury is not such that we ought to cut off the needed appropriations for the development of the country. The Department of Agriculture by its work, in my judgment, has added hundreds of millions of dollars in value to our products from the farms every year, and I want to hold up their hands in the future. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has referred to the fact that Members on this floor are constantly posing as the friends of the farmer. He is right in that. I have noticed it myself. [Laughter.] I have seen some gentlemen posing on this floor as the friends of the American farmer, and they are touchy about it. But the trouble with gentlemen is that whenever a proposition is submitted here for the real benefit of the American farmer, and the votes are taken, these gentlemen are absent.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman referred to the fact that we are seeking to cut down some few appropriations. We are seeking to cure some of the things that have been carried on and permitted under the administration of the gentleman's party. I want to call the attention of this committee to this state of affairs, which I say is appalling. Listen to the figures. It cost the Treasury Department $15,390 to disburse $17,000,000. It cost the Department of Agriculture $114,620 to disburse $21,391,876, the cost being nearly eight times as much, and it has so continued for years and years. And no wonder, when you look a little further in this bill and find that in the Forestry Division, in one paragraph, 419 clerks are provided for. I suppose they are the gentlemen who look after the disbursement of this fund.

The Auditor for the State Department audits all the appropriations of all the departments, and for the auditing of all, amounting to $162,000,000, the disbursement cost was only $118,000, or about $4,000 more than it cost to disburse $21,000,000 in the Department of Agriculture.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that an investigation of this bill shows, and it simply follows the bills that have preceded it, and in my opinion somebody in the Department of Agriculture made this bill from the preceding one, that they have simply cut down at haphazard, without regard to any rule or anything else. An inspection of this bill will show that the Department of Agriculture is honeycombed with graft in the shape of the employment of useless employees, and particularly clerks.

Mr. LAMB. I challenge that statement.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman made a comparison between the cost of disbursements in the Department of Agriculture and the cost of the Auditor for the State Department.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman understand that the Auditor for the State Department is a disbursing officer?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; I do not; but he audits all the accounts of all the departments.

Mr. MANN. How does the gentleman make a comparison between one office doing one work and another office doing an entirely different work?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If it suits the gentleman any better, the Treasury Department disbursed $117,600,000, and the cost of disbursement was $15,390. The appropriations for the Department of Agriculture amount not to $15,000,000 or $16,000,000, but to $21,391,930, and the cost for disbursing that is $114,620. I say this bill, with the permanent appropriations for the department provided in other bills added to the amount carried by this bill, amounts to over $21,000,000 to run the Department of Agriculture, and out of that there does not go to the benefit of the American farmer more than $5,000,000. The gentleman can not show that a dollar more than that goes to the benefit of the American farmer. You provide in this bill for wood rangers and clerks galore—law clerks and every kind of clerk on the face of the earth. As I said this morning, or meant to say, if one real genuine double-jointed American farmer should go into one of the rooms in that department and spit on them, he would drown a dozen of your spider-legged, dude clerks.

Mr. LAMB. I ask for a vote.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I ask that my amendment be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 7, strike out "twenty-four thousand" and insert in lieu thereof "twenty-six thousand six hundred and thirty."

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. LAMB) there were—ayes 34, noes 20.

Mr. LAMB. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were refused, 18 Members, not a sufficient number, seconding the demand.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 8, page 21, insert as a new paragraph:

"For the investigation and improvement of ginseng and the control of diseases and insects detrimental to the growth of this plant, $5,000."

Mr. LEVER. To that, Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I hardly think it is subject to a point of order, but I do not care to argue that matter. The ginseng industry in this country is getting to be very important. The last figures I have are for 1909, but the exports have been rapidly increasing since that time. In 1909 we exported $1,276,179 worth of this root. You see that is quite an important industry, bringing to the people of this country each year considerably over $1,000,000. This is exported almost exclusively, very little being used in this country. The exports measure quite accurately the amount of the production of the plant.

Formerly it was not cultivated but grew wild, but as the woods were cut off and the land was devoted to agricultural purposes this plant commenced to disappear, and it is now being raised in gardens and cultivated. The price that is received for it is about $6.50 a pound. That will give you some idea of the value of this plant. We received last year for good root $6.50 a pound.

Now, the plant is subject to many diseases. As it grew wild in the woods years ago, the various diseases and insect enemies that it now has were not known, but since the commencement of the cultivation of the plant it is found that it is subject to mold and leaf wilt and various insect enemies.

The Department of Agriculture has been doing something to help the raisers of this plant. I know that an expert was sent to northern Wisconsin last year, where a great deal is raised, and the following of his advice resulted in the saving of probably $100,000 worth of the root. We appreciate the value of scientific research along this line. We feel that the industry is of such a magnitude now, considerably over a million dollars a year, that the Government can well afford to spend this small amount of money in assisting the people who raise the plant. It is raised in Kentucky, Ohio, New York, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, and Minnesota. Not much is raised east of the Alleghenies, and very little south of Kentucky, and very little west of Minnesota, although they are experimenting with it on the Pacific coast.

I would like, Mr. Chairman, and I ask unanimous consent, to extend my remarks in the Record on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask my colleague why it was he did not present this matter to the committee if it is of such magnitude as he says it is. I want to say to him that we did inquire about it and we have some answers from the department about it.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. The department is doing something. I did not realize the limitations of the expenditures of the department, but I felt that if it was specifically appropriated we would be more apt to get better results.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, in the first place, the department has authority now, as we understand it, to make the investigation which the gentleman has in mind. As a matter of fact, it is doing some work on ginseng. Mr. Taylor, representing the Bureau of Plant Industry, when before the committee, made this statement:

Mr. TAYLOR. Ginseng is not being actively worked upon by the bureau. It is in pretty good commercial shape without departmental assistance, though we are keeping in touch with it. In the matter of ginseng diseases we are working in connection with the Cornell Experiment Station in New York.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEVER. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina understand that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MORSE] who has just addressed the committee is the leading expert of the country on the raising of ginseng and probably knows more about it than almost anybody in the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. LEVER. I did not have that information, but I am glad to have it.

Mr. MANN. I am a little interested in the subject myself. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MORSE] has a standing in reference to the raising of ginseng which is probably not excelled by anybody else in the country, and he speaks by the card when he refers to the difficulties of raising the plant.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I will say to my friend from Illinois that the statement that he has given us, while interesting, does not controvert the position I took a moment ago, that the department now has the authority to do the very thing asked for by the gentleman from Wisconsin, and if the department considers it a vital proposition, the department itself would estimate for it in a separate item for this business.

Mr. MANN. That is what I was trying to direct the attention of the gentleman to. The department does not have that knowledge with reference to the matter which gives it the authority to say whether the investigation should be made or not. The department has said that the trade was in such a condition that it did not require departmental study of the subject. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MORSE], who knows more about the raising of ginseng than anyone in the Agricultural Department, tells us he, at least, is of the opinion that we ought to be studying and investigating the diseases and the insects which infest this plant.

Mr. LEVER. I would like to know in that connection how the gentleman from Wisconsin, being the highest authority in the country on the growing, manufacturing, and the like, of ginseng is to be helped by the department?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is not asking help for himself. He is asking an appropriation to help an industry which adds to our exports to the extent of about a million and a half dollars a year.

Mr. LEVER. I realize, of course, the commercial importance of this project.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman from South Carolina read the beautiful novel called The Harvester?

Mr. LEVER. I am sorry to say that I have not.

Mr. BUTLER. If the gentleman would read that novel, I am quite sure he would be willing to vote for a liberal appropriation for ginseng.

Mr. LEVER. It is unfortunate for me that I have not read the novel.

Mr. MANN. The closest connection we have with the Orient is ginseng. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEVER. I presume that is close enough.

Mr. MANN. That is very close when it comes to the use of ginseng.

Mr. LEVER. I will say, Mr. Chairman, speaking more seriously, that this is a matter that has not come before the committee except in a very casual way, as shown from the examination of the witnesses before the committee, and we do not feel, without some statement from the department that this money is necessary and needed for this purpose, that the Committee of the Whole would be justified, upon the statement even of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MORSE], who is an expert on the proposition, in allowing this appropriation to go through. I trust, therefore, that the amendment will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina insist upon his point of order?

Mr. LEVER. No. I do not think it is subject to the point of order.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] be permitted to extend in the RECORD his remarks on the subject of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MORSE], just for the purpose of seeing what the gentleman from New York [Mr. AKIN] will do.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman will find out, if the Chairman puts the request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LEVER) there were—ayes 29, noes 37.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the investigation and improvement of forage crops and methods of forage-crop production, $20,000.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee if there was any discussion in the committee on the advisability of increasing this item? I see that the amount carried in the bill is the same as that carried in the bill of the current year, and is the amount asked for by the department.

Mr. LAMB. It is the same thing. We gave them what they asked for.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, while I shall not offer an amendment to increase the amount, it seems to me a rather small amount to appropriate for this purpose. The improvement of forage crops—the discovery of new forage crops—is one of the most important matters for consideration in the entire field of agriculture. The department has been doing very excellent work in past years in the improvement of certain clovers, alfalfa, and other forage crops that have heretofore been cultivated almost exclusively in the West. It has been found that the various classes of alfalfa have done very well indeed in the East, and particularly on sandy lands that have not been producing very good crops.

Mr. LAMB. I think the bulk of this money is spent for that purpose.

Mr. MONDELL. These crops largely increase the value of such lands. They are valuable for restoring the fertility of run-down lands. Furthermore, in the West the department has been carrying on the work of finding improved forage crops for alkaline conditions. Investigations of that kind, of course, can be carried on under the item which succeeds this one, but the investigation of forage crops for dry-farm conditions can be made under this item, as I understand it; and it is a very large field and a very important field, and the department has been making some valuable investigations in that field and has introduced some valuable new plants and shown a large amount—

Mr. LAMB. But for dry farming there is another provision for that; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MONDELL. There is another general provision.

Mr. LAMB. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, under this item the investigation and improvement of forage crops for dry-farm conditions as well as humid conditions could be carried on; and while I imagine that the department felt constrained to keep the amount as low as possible in view of what they understood to be the view of gentlemen of the majority as to appropriations generally, I believe they could use to a very great advantage a considerably larger appropriation; but as the gentleman from Virginia would probably resist any increase, I shall not offer an amendment, but I express the hope that in the future the item may be increased. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For testing and breeding fibrous plants, which may be used for paper making, $7,580.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 21, line 12, after the word "plants," add the following: "Including the test of flax straw in cooperation with the North Dakota Agricultural College"; also, on line 13, strike out the words "seven thousand five hundred and eighty dollars" and insert "$15,000."

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Chairman, the item would read like this if the amendment should be adopted:

For testing and breeding fibrous plants, including the testing of flax straw in cooperation with the North Dakota Agricultural College, which may be used for paper making, $15,000.

In connection with this proposed amendment I would like to present a letter from Dr. Galloway, Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry, and have it read at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF PLANT INDUSTRY,
Washington, D. C. January 25, 1912.

Hon. L. B. HANNA,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. HANNA: Replying to your recent communication, in which you state that you intend to propose an amendment to the agricultural bill when same shall come up on the floor of the House providing for the utilization of flax straw, I note your inquiry as to whether the department has done any work in this connection.

The department has in the past given some attention to flax straw and has reached the conclusion that it is one of the promising crop materials now going to waste. Nevertheless, we feel that caution should be used in its exploitation and that whatever is attempted in the way of its use should be based on careful experimental work.

Our experts estimate that there are produced annually in the United States between three and four million tons of flax straw, of which about one-half is grown in North Dakota. At present not more than 250,000 to 300,000 tons of this material finds profitable utilization. The greatest use at present is for furniture upholstery tow; a much less quantity is used in the production of flax twine, and a still smaller amount in the manufacture of insulating materials, flax felt, liner felt, and other similar products.

Under the appropriation which Congress makes at the present time "for testing and breeding fibrous plants which may be used for paper making," laboratory experiments have been conducted with a view to determining the best and most practicable methods of making book, writing, and other kinds of paper from straw. Most of this work, however, has been confined to the utilization of cornstalks, which at present represent the greatest waste material and is therefore receiving more attention than other by-products.

In the flax work that has been done excellent qualities of pulp, with fair yields of fiber—up to nearly 40 per cent on bone-dry raw material—have been secured. Some difficulties have been encountered in bleaching, but it is not believed that these are insurmountable. As indicated above, we consider the material promising, but the chief question involved would probably be the cost at which the raw material could be laid down at a mill at some central point in the flax-growing areas.

A good many extravagant claims have been made and considerable promoting has been done on the basis of the supposed value of the straw of seed flax for textile purposes. Considering its matted and broken condition as it comes from the thrashing machine and the probable cost of hacking or carding it into suitable shape for spinning, it is rather doubtful whether it has any practical value for this purpose.

Should there be any further information which we can furnish you, we shall, of course, be glad to do so.

Very truly, yours,

B. T. GALLOWAY,
Chief of Bureau.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Chairman, Dr. Galloway states in his letter that there are some three or four million tons of flax straw produced in the United States every year, and that about 50 per cent of it is produced in North Dakota, the State which I have the honor to represent here in Congress.

At the present time there is practically none of the 2,000,000 tons of flax straw which is produced in North Dakota each year that is being utilized for any purpose whatever, except a very small amount which is fed to stock, and the balance, practically all of it, is burned in the fields. In this day and age, when we are looking forward to finding some method or means whereby we can conserve and preserve the forests of the continent for future generations, and when we are at the present time using thousands upon thousands of acres of spruce timber every year for the making of paper, it would seem to be a wise policy for us to determine and to find some method or way by which the great amount of fibrous plants which are not now being utilized might be made some use of.

I believe in conservation, and believe that were the flax straw of the country utilized for the purpose of making paper that it would be the means of saving an immense amount of timber, as stated heretofore, and would use up a raw flax-straw product which to-day is practically not utilized at all and is simply wasted.

In North Dakota we grow flax for the seed alone, and the straw and fiber, with the exception of a very little of it, is burned in the fields, and so is an absolute waste.

The North Dakota Agricultural College is making some experiments in the use of flax straw. It has also perhaps taken a more advanced position than any other agricultural college in the country upon the methods for the production of flax and also for the prevention of the diseases to which flax is peculiarly heir to. Prof. H. L. Bolley, of the North Dakota Agricultural College, is a flax expert, and is not only the greatest in his line as a flax expert in this country, but in fact in the whole world, and a few years since was sent abroad by the United States Government for the purpose of investigating the use of flax, the production of flax, and its diseases in Russia and other European countries.

At the present time the Department of Agriculture here in Washington is making experiments in the testing and breeding of fibrous plants for paper making, but almost entirely, as stated in Dr. Galloway's letter, in the way of making paper from cornstalks.

If this amendment which I have offered prevails, then they will take up in cooperation with the North Dakota Agricultural College the proposition of making experiments with flax straw for paper making in my State and in other States, with a view of stopping this great waste of a splendid raw material which is not utilized now as it should and ought to be.

We are trying in every way to make the farmers, who are the foundation of this Government, more prosperous, and if some method can be found to utilize the vast amount of material which they now produce and which is wasted, as in the instance of flax straw, then we are doing them and the country a great service. If the farmer of North Dakota and elsewhere shall not only have a market for the flaxseed which he produces, but shall also have a market for the flax straw itself, then it would mean that he would receive just that much more compensation for the labor, toil, and expense which he gives for the production of his flax crop, and thereby make him just that much more prosperous.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment is a just one and one that is in the interests of the farmers and all the people of this country, and I hope that it may prevail.

Mr. HAUGEN. Just a brief statement, Mr. Chairman. While the bill under consideration does not carry the item suggested by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. HANNA], the matter was discussed in the committee, and I believe it was agreed that a point of order would not be raised against this amendment if offered on the floor. But my impression is that the amount was fixed at $5,000, and I believe the gentleman now proposes to amend it by providing for $10,000.

Mr. GARNER. Make it $12,000.

Mr. HANNA. It would increase it $7,420. I will, however, change the amendment so as to increase the amount $5,000 and make it in all $12,580.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modification.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "fifteen" and insert in lieu thereof the words "twelve thousand five hundred and eighty."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I judge by the signs around me that this amendment, being offered by a member of the combination known as the Committee on Agriculture, will be agreed to by the rest of the combination.

Mr. LAMB. Not at all, my friend.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman going to oppose it? I have not heard his voice against it.

Mr. LAMB. Yes. I will consent to $5,000 increase because I think Mr. HANNA would most likely have secured this from the committee had he presented the case during the session of the committee.

Mr. MANN. Between the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. HANNA] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] that it should go in. That is just what I stated.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MANN. This is merely preliminary. I want to discuss the proposition.

Mr. Chairman, this item went into the agricultural bill in the first place on my motion, but not at this place in the bill. It was first inserted in the miscellaneous items. It was afterwards divided up and transferred—one item to the Bureau of Plant Industry and another item to the Bureau of Forestry. I offered the proposition in the House because of the interest I acquired growing out of the special investigation of pulp and paper, which was some time ago, and of which the new Members of the House, of course, have very little knowledge. The purpose of the item, as I have always regarded it, was the breeding of some kind of a fibrous plant. I do not intend to object to this amendment. I fear the purpose of the original item will be lost sight of. Everybody knows you can make paper out of flax straw. It does not require any investigation to ascertain that. Nobody yet has been able to utilize the flax straw in North Dakota to any extent, profitably, in making paper. The original item in the bill was for the purpose of acquiring some kind of a plant from which they could make cheap paper.

Our spruce forests were disappearing, and it was desired, if possible, to provide in some way some plant from which you could make the ordinary cheap paper that is used in newspapers, schoolbooks, some of the magazines, and so forth. You never can make that kind of paper out of flax straw in competition with wood paper, because it is too expensive. They have endeavored over here to make paper out of cornstalks, and I suppose they will keep it up for some time. It is a perfectly simple operation to make paper out of cornstalks, but the time never will come when they can make paper out of cornstalks which will compete with paper made by grinding spruce wood against a grindstone.

Mr. HANNA. Dr. Galloway in his letter said that under this item at the present time their experiments were almost entirely with the use of cornstalks.

Mr. MANN. The doctor was slightly mistaken. They have experimented with a large number of different plants. They do me the courtesy every once in a while, because of the interest I used to have and the interest I now have in the subject, to send me samples of paper which they make and reports which they receive in reference to the work they are doing. If they could find some plant by development, with a large amount of fiber in it, which could grow very thickly on the ground, so that it could be used primarily for the making of paper, they might succeed, but they never will find any kind of a by-product from agricultural production which can be used for the making of cheap print paper in competition with ground wood paper, because the cost of bringing together is greater than the cost of making the ground wood paper, and it always will be. I do not doubt that it may be practicable to find or develop some paper mills in North Dakota. What you want most is capital.

The paper mills of the East have experimented with flax straw and with these other straws for years. They can tell you more than the Department of Agriculture will ever be able to learn from this small appropriation. But doubtless the experiment station of North Dakota can use the money profitably, either by learning things that are positive or by learning things that are negative. I do not desire, if possible, to have the Department of Agriculture divert what was intended to be an appropriation for experiments in the breeding of plants, in the hope that we might produce a plant which would save us from being dependent upon Canada for cheap print paper, into an effort to make a higher grade of flax-straw paper. Flax-straw paper is a high grade of paper if it is made in some ways, and it is a much higher grade of paper in any event than the ordinary newspaper made from ground wood.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. HANNA].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the section, and move, in line 12, page 21, to insert, between the word "fibrous" and the word "plants," the words "trees and," so that it will read, "For testing and breeding fibrous trees and plants which may be used for paper making," and so forth.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RODDENBERRY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That provision is carried in another part of the bill.

Mr. LEVER. Yes; that provision is carried elsewhere in the bill.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. Then I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the breeding and physiological study of alkali-resistant and drought-resistant crops, $18,140.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 21, lines 16 and 17, strike out the words "eighteen thousand one hundred and forty" and insert the words "twenty-five thousand."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, not being a member of the Committee on Agriculture, I fear that this very modest amendment will not be accepted by the committee. But I do feel that it is very important that this appropriation should be increased. It provides for the breeding and study of two very important classes of plants—first, the alkali-resistant plants, and, second, the drought-resistant plants.

Just now we are extending our agricultural area, except as we are extending it by increasing the farm area in the older portions of the country, in regions where we are overcoming or attempting to overcome two great difficulties; the one in the irrigated region, the alkali; the other in the dry-farming region, the drought.

In regions where the rainfall is light, the alkali, which is deposited in the disintegration of the rocks, accumulates. In regions of very heavy rainfall the disintegrated alkali content of the rocks is carried off by the rainfall. As the rock disintegrates and the rains fall, the alkali is carried off in the streams. But in an arid region, where there is but little rain and slight run-off, there is very little opportunity for carrying off the alkaline content of the disintegrated rocks, and it remains in the soil, so that when we begin to irrigate we find that the alkali, which is distributed through the soil to a considerable depth, has a tendency to rise to the surface, and it does so to such an extent that in some localities seed will not germinate, or if the seed germinates the plant withers and dies.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, this project is all itemized here and given in almost as good figures as my friend uses when he commences one of his sermons [laughter], and it might aid him and shorten the discussion if I should turn this tabulation over to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of Agriculture and his assistants, realizing the frame of mind of the gentlemen on the other side, except when it came to a matter of an amendment offered by the members of the committee, understood it was necessary to keep these items down as low as possible.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman should discriminate between an amendment offered by a member of the committee, which has been discussed in committee and agreed to, and an amendment not offered by a member of the committee, but by another Member on the floor of the House, concerning which nobody has had any opportunity of discussion or acquiring information.

Mr. MONDELL. I have no desire to cut off debate on these very important subjects. I am willing and anxious that the gentleman shall secure all the information he requires.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman may be an expert on this proposition, but I would like to have some testimony as to how the increased appropriation would be used. We would like to have some light upon that proposition.

Mr. MONDELL. I think the department could utilize an additional $7,000 very easily. This is a wide field. The department has not been increasing its work in the field simply because it has not been given larger appropriations.

The country where the alkali-resistant and drought-resistant plants are needed has not a very large representation on the floor of this House. In addition to not having a representation large in numbers, the Representatives of that country are very modest, I think sometimes too modest, in their demands and their requests.

There are great problems in that western country. We are gradually washing the alkali out of the soil on the irrigation projects, but in the meantime we need plants that will withstand the alkali, as far as it is possible to find such plants, of which there are many in the world.

Mr. LAMB. I renew my request that my good friend take his project, with all its subdivisions, and put it into his speech and print it, so that we can get along with the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent that I may have three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that his time be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. I want to assure my friend that I have no desire to put a speech in the Record. That is not my object at all. What I want is an increased appropriation. I am in earnest in this matter. I feel that this appropriation is ridiculously inadequate for the tremendously important work that is being carried on. I have referred to the alkali-resistant plants. Then there is the wide field of drought-resistant plants. The American pioneer is making a heroic effort just now, and has been during the last few years, under exceedingly trying conditions, to conquer the semiarid plains and mountain valleys, and he needs all the encouragement he can possibly have from the Department of Agriculture in every way, and particularly in the introduction and improvement of drought-resistant plants. The department has done some very good work along this line, and has found in the arid regions of Asia and Africa some plants that have been introduced in the semiarid regions of this country to good advantage. But there is still a great work to be done. If we are to increase largely the agricultural acreage of the country it must be in the semiarid regions, where plants must be grown with the very minimum of moisture. We have at least 300,000,000 or 350,000,000 acres of land in this country that some day ought to produce food for man and beast, but which are now producing only a small amount of scattered and stunted grasses.

These lands are gradually being conquered. We are gradually adopting methods under which plants can be successfully grown. We are gradually finding varieties of plants which meet the conditions. In my opinion this is to-day the most important pioneer work being done in this country, and it is ridiculous that this appropriation is so small. I say that without any reflection on the committee, because I know they intend to do what is right in all these matters. But I say it is ridiculous to attempt to do that great work and to occupy this highly important field with an appropriation of $18,000. I have in mind some very important work that the department can do in the plains country with this additional appropriation of about $7,000. Following as I have the liberal action of the committee in the matter of flax, I am very much in hopes that the committee will see its way clear to accept my amendment.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, just a few words in reply to the gentleman from Wyoming. The work of the Department of Agriculture, to which he has made reference, is a very important work, and the department is doing a great deal in that country along the line suggested by the gentleman; but I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this appropriation, identical in amount, has run along for several years. This is rather a scientific work, which requires experts.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEVER. Certainly.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Is it not true that the problem of taking care of the alkali in the soil in the West is becoming more important all the time and that the appropriation heretofore made for that purpose is insufficient to cover it? And is it not also true that one of the bulletins for which we have the greatest call from the entire West is for some means of handling alkali and introducing alkali-resistant plants?

Mr. LEVER. Yes; all that the gentleman says is true. The Committee on Agriculture recognizes that fact, but the gentleman must remember that the Department of Agriculture has asked for every dollar it feels it can spend wisely and economically, and the committee has given to the department exactly what it asked for and which is carried in the current appropriation bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Of course, the department would extend it a good deal more if they had the funds for that purpose. Is it not looked upon as very important to develop the arid regions of the West?

Mr. LEVER. That is true; but the committee would hardly be justified in a matter of this kind in coming into the House with an appropriation beyond the amount asked for by the department, unless there had been given to the committee some very good reasons, either from the officials in the department or from outside parties, and that has not been done in this case. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will be voted down, and I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the paragraph by inserting on page 21, line 19, between the word "culture"—

Mr. GARNER. We have not reached that paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the investigation and improvement of sugar-producing plants, including their utilization and culture, $30,795.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment to this paragraph. In line 19, page 21, I move to strike out the word "thirty" and insert the word "thirty-five."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 19, strike out the word "thirty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty-five."

Mr. MANN. Why not strike out the paragraph? What good is it now?

Mr. GARNER. I suppose the gentleman from Illinois refers to some action taken last night by the Democratic caucus. I do not care to go into that matter. I prefer that this amendment should be considered on its merits rather than the side issue of what may be done with reference to the tariff on sugar.

Mr. Chairman, the situation is this: The work being done under this paragraph is in Wisconsin, Colorado, Kansas, and Georgia. The district I have the honor to represent is undertaking to and has put in a great deal of sugar the past year, producing some 15,000 or 20,000 tons of sugar.

Mr. MANN. What kind, cane or beet?

Mr. GARNER. Cane and beet, both. The beet-sugar industry in that section has not developed to the point where it can be produced profitably; but cane sugar has been and I believe can be produced more profitably than at any point in the United States.

We are going to try and get from the agricultural department of Texas $5,000, and they asked me, through their association, to secure an amendment to the bill for $15,000 to be added to it. I consulted Dr. Galloway, and he told me that he thought $5,000 in connection with the amount that would be furnished by the agricultural department of Texas would be sufficient.

Mr. LAMB. I would like to ask the gentleman why he did not go before the committee and present this matter?

Mr. GARNER. The reason why I did not present this to the committee was because at that time it had not been drawn to my attention. Since the bill has been reported I have received a letter, dated February 23, from the Rio Grande Cane Growers' Association, in which they set out the reasons for asking this appropriation. There has been invested by citizens there from various portions of the United States in that valley in the last four years, according to statements made and filed before the Rivers and Harbors Committee, between $30,000,000 and $40,000,000.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman seriously think that it would be playing upon the confidence of those people to encourage them in planting cane sugar when the intention is to ruin the entire industry?

Mr. GARNER. As I remarked to the gentleman from Illinois when I introduced this amendment, I do not care to go into the question of the tariff on sugar. I will say to the gentleman, however, that I hope by this appropriation and the experiments being made down there by small farmers with 10, 20, or 30 acres in cane sugar and some in beet sugar—I hope and have reason to believe that it will demonstrate the fact that in that immediate section of the United States you can produce sugar as cheaply as you can in any place in the world.

Mr. MANN. We might as well make an appropriation to provide for an experiment with a river in Hades. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. Well, that is the conclusion of the gentleman from Illinois. I feel sure, however, that the gentleman will not oppose this amendment, because I think he will agree himself that it is advisable for the department to experiment with the raising of sugar in this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], or any other gentleman who considers this matter, will realize its importance when I tell him that this money that is now being expended—the $30,000—is being entirely expended in Kansas, Wisconsin, Colorado, and at a small station in Georgia. As I have stated, citizens from the North, from every State in the Union, and especially from the Middle West, from Iowa, Kansas, Illinois, Missouri, and the Middle Western States, have gone down into that valley and have purchased land, and they have now come to the conclusion that truck farming is a minor consideration, one might say, so far as the principal industry of the valley is concerned; that it must develop into cane and cotton.

The result is that it is necessary to experiment there with reference to the growing of cane or beet sugar. These are small farmers, and they are unable to make the experiments themselves. They have gone, however, to the extent of raising sufficient sugar to make a limited experiment, and I am happy to say it has proven quite successful. I hope we will be able to persuade the Agricultural and Mechanical College to supplement the appropriation which I hope to add to this item.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. How much sugar did the gentleman say was produced in his district or neighborhood?

Mr. GARNER. In that district from fifteen to twenty thousand tons in 1911. That is the best information I have. In 1910 there were 9,000 tons.

Mr. MANN. How much more land is there there, which is available, that can be used for the same purpose?

Mr. GARNER. The statement made before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors was that there was about 180,000 acres that could be utilized for sugar.

Mr. MANN. How much sugar would that produce?

Mr. GARNER. This is a new country, and they are just now putting it in sugar; therefore I am unable to give the gentleman that information. A great deal of cane is shipped in from Louisiana to be planted in that section. I could not tell the gentleman the exact number of acres that are in cane at this time.

Mr. MANN. How much sugar would the hundred and eighty thousand acres be capable of producing, probably?

Mr. GARNER. I am not a sugar expert, and I could not give the gentleman that information. I know it is estimated that when there is a full production in the valley there will be produced from 150,000 to 200,000 tons of sugar a year.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman believe that neighborhood will ever be able to raise as much cane with the sugar question as will the gentleman's party? [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. I doubt that myself. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I observe that the gentleman is an expert on sugar growing in the United States, and I would like to ask the question whether he believes that sugar can be produced anywhere in the United States as cheaply as it can in other countries, especially in Cuba?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I am not a sugar expert, as my friend from Iowa would indicate by his question, but I do know this, that the people from Louisiana, some of the largest sugar-growing interests in Louisiana, have purchased large tracts of land in that valley, and they claim that they can raise a third more sugar in the Rio Grande Valley than they can in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. DUPRE. I deny that they can.

Mr. GARNER. I say they claim that. I am not a sugar expert and could not testify with reference to the correctness of that claim.

Mr. HAUGEN. That purchase was made, however, before the Democratic caucus of yesterday.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Does the gentleman's amendment contemplate the experimentation in diseases and insects that affect sugar beets, such as the curly leaf, the spot leaf, and the curly top?

Mr. GARNER. It certainly does, and I will say to the gentleman from Colorado that if he will consult the Agricultural Department he will find some work that they have been doing in his State.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I know about that. I was wondering whether this is the item that would cover it.

Mr. GARNER. This is the item that would cover it, as I understand.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It does not exactly say so.

Mr. GARNER. It gives the department, one might say, unlimited authority with reference to the manner in which it shall investigate or experiment with reference to producing the sugar plant.

And in the gentleman's State there are two stations, one at Rocky Ford, Colo., one at Garden City, Colo., and there is one at Madison, Wis., and then an experiment station in the State of Georgia. Those are the only States that are having any of this work done at this time, and, as I say, the tremendous investments which have been made in the district which I have the honor to represent I think will thoroughly justify the Government in appropriating $5,000 additional for the purpose of making these experiments in that section of the country.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It seems to me we ought to appropriate a good deal more than that.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in two minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I trust the gentleman will not insist on that, as I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

Mr. LAMB. We want to rise.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman expect to dispose of the paragraph?

Mr. LAMB. I would like to get through with this amendment and not leave the paragraph—well, I will move that all debate close in 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. A gentleman here has an amendment to increase the amount, and some gentlemen here have propositions to strike the paragraph out, in view of the action of the Democratic caucus.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, may I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter I have received from the Rio Grande Cane Growers' Association for the information of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letter above referred to is as follows:

BROWNSVILLE, February 23, 1912.

DEAR SIR: At a meeting of the Rio Grande Cane Growers' Association held on the 20th instant, in the rooms of the Brownsville Chamber of Commerce, the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That the necessities of the sugar-cane industry in the Rio Grande Valley require the establishment of a sugar-cane experiment station; and that the association lay the facts before our Senators and Representatives at Washington and request their cooperation in an endeavor to secure from Congress an increase in the annual appropriation for the South Texas Garden from the present appropriation of $10,000 to one of $25,000, the increase of $15,000 to be devoted to the establishment and operation of a sugar experiment station at said garden.

"Also to call the attention of our Senators and Representatives at Washington to the fact that the South Texas Garden was established in 1907, and its appropriation granted for the purpose of assisting our farmers by experimenting with the staple and other crops that are grown in the valley. That, for reasons unknown, such policy appears to have been changed by the Department of Agriculture and experiments with staple crops have apparently been discontinued in favor of experiments with tropical and semitropical plants that are of little value to the farmers of the district at present; and to ask our Representatives to lend their influence in an effort to have the South Texas Garden again take up its original work, which has proved so valuable to the farmers of this section of the country."

The necessity for the establishment of a sugar experiment station in the Rio Grande Valley is very great. The valley is fast becoming a factor in the cane-sugar production of the country, and from the peculiar conditions existing particularly needs the aid of the Government to assist in the solution of the complex problem.

Generally speaking, the Department of Agriculture has done but little experimentation with sugar cane, the theory being that the production of sugar cane was largely in the hands of corporations or large planters, who could afford to do their own experimenting. In most sections of the United States and its possessions this is true, but in the Rio Grande Valley the contrary is the case, and the cane producers are small farmers growing cane as a money crop, and are not in a position to carry out requisite experiments on their own account.

The Rio Grande Valley, agriculturally speaking, is a new country, with peculiar climatic conditions.

The seed cane is imported mostly from Louisiana, where conditions are altogether different, and canes that are well adapted for the Louisiana climate may prove very inferior for this part of Texas.

Cane growing in the Rio Grande Valley is grown under irrigation, and from the likelihood of killing frost around the first of the year, it is necessary to commence the grinding season not later than November 1. We usually have fall rain in September and October, and consequently it is very difficult to get the proper ripeness in the canes at grinding time.

There are very important subjects for experimentation—there are also other important experiments that should be made in planting, cultivation, local diseases of cane, soils and their adaptability for the growth of cane, results to be gained from fertilizers, irrigation methods, the need and effect of drainage, the best method of laying out cane fields under irrigation, and last, but not least, a study of the insect pests affecting cane and the most effective method for checking their ravages.

The cane growers of the valley have had several disastrous seasons, and their experience has convinced them that a thorough course of experiments is imperative before they can hope to overcome their difficulties. They are not discouraged, but, on the other hand, are persevering and feel sure that this will ultimately become one of the best sugar-producing sections of the world; but at the present time they need Government assistance in experimentation.

Our cane growers, although nearly all small farmers, would be willing, if necessary, to contribute toward the expense of such sugar-experiment station, but they are too few in number at present to carry the whole burden themselves. They realize that a sugar-experiment station to be of real use requires a considerable appropriation, and the $15,000 asked for is the minimum annual amount that would support it.

The benefits to the industry of the valley and the country at large that will accrue from the establishment of such an institution would be enormous.

The association therefore respectfully asks that you take such steps as you deem advisable to further the object set forth in their resolution. Thanking you for any effort you may be able to put forth in our behalf, we remain,

Yours, very truly,

RIO GRANDE CANE GROWERS' ASSOCIATION,
By R. C. WHARTON, Secretary.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend the remarks I made a few moments ago in offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BORLAND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R.

18960) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and had directed him to report that it had come to no resolution thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. KENT was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House without leaving copies the papers in the case of Napoleon S. Dixon, Sixty-second Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make a change of reference of this document (H. Doc. No. 551) from the Committee on Military Affairs to the Committee on Appropriations.

The Clerk read as follows:

Letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting the report of the results of an investigation made by the Adjutant General of the Army as to the sums of money actually expended in the State of Texas in 1855 and 1860 in payment of State volunteers, etc.

Mr. MANN. What is this?

The SPEAKER. A change of reference of a document from the Committee on Military Affairs to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MANN. This belongs to the Committee on Claims.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the history of the transaction to be that the Committee on Appropriations has had it for several years, and the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has no objection to its going to the Committee on Appropriations. It first was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MANN. That item was brought up on the floor of the House. I think it has never been reported from the Committee on Appropriations. I do not know that I have any objection to the reference, although I am inclined to think it belongs to the Committee on Claims. However, I do not object.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. As I remember, it is only asking for information relative to the amount of money expended by the State of Texas in defending her boundary during the years mentioned in the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Well, if it is a claim—

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will state it might result in a claim, but at present it really asks for information.

Mr. MANN. It does not ask for information.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title again; of course, the Chair never read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Letter from the Acting Secretary of War transmitting a report of the results of an investigation made by The Adjutant General of the Army as to the sums of money actually expended in the State of Texas between 1855 and 1860 in payment of State volunteers, etc.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, that ought to go to the Appropriations Committee, if it is to be considered as a former appropriation in reference to the same matter was considered. A former appropriation covering the same thing was brought from the Committee on Appropriations, and it seems to me that this ought to go to that committee. I do not object to the reference.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair will refer it to the Committee on Appropriations. If there is any question about it, the Chair will examine the matter closely and change the reference, if he thinks it should be changed. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, March 4, 1912, at 12 o'clock m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor submitting an estimate of appropriation for cost of locating and repairing leak in cast-iron water main from Galveston Harbor, Tex., for use of United States immigration station on Pelican Spit, Galveston Harbor, Tex. (H. Doc. No. 587); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Ouachita River, Ark. (H. Doc. No. 588); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed with illustrations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. HEFLIN, from the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions, to which was referred the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 36) authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to make an exhibit at the Fifth National Corn Exposition at Columbia, S. C., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 385), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. WEBB, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 2434) providing for an increase of salary to the United States marshal for the district of Connecticut, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 386), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. FIELDS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred sundry bills of the House, reported in lieu thereof the bill (H. PAYMENT OF MONEY IN POLITICAL CAMPAIGNS.

Mr. BRIGGS. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report back favorably with an amendment Senate resolution 79, offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] June 22, 1911, and I submit a report (No. 447) thereon.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, First. That the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate be, and it is hereby, directed to inquire and report to the Senate as early as practicable the amount of money subscribed and paid to every committee of any political party or to any member of such committee, or to any person acting under the authority of or on behalf of such committee as treasurer or otherwise, by any person, firm, association, corporation, or committee to influence the result, or attempt to influence the result, of the election November 8, 1904, and November 3, 1908, at which Representatives in the Congress of the United States were elected, giving the names of such persons, firms, associations, corporations, or committees and the respective amounts subscribed and paid by each of them as aforesaid.

Second. That said committee is authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate and during any recess of the Senate or of the Congress; to hold sessions at such place or places as it may deem most convenient for the purposes of this inquiry; to employ stenographers and such other clerical force as may be deemed necessary; to send for persons, books, records, and papers; to administer oaths; and that the expenses of the inquiry be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee.

Third. That said committee shall also report to the Senate what measures, if any, are necessary to further prohibit or curtail such subscriptions and payments so as to lessen and confine them to proper and legitimate objects in relation to such elections and prevent the undue or corrupt use of money in such elections.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the committee will be stated.

Mr. LODGE. Has present consideration been asked?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been asked, the Chair understands; but the committee report an amendment and the question will not be put until the amendment has been read.

Mr. LODGE. I will let the amendment be read.

Mr. BRIGGS. I did not ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair apologizes.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that the amendment be read and that the report of the committee, if it is in writing, be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, lines 4 and 5, strike out the words "every committee of any political party" and insert in lieu thereof "the national committees of all political parties and the national congressional campaign committees of all political parties."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go to the calendar.

Mr. BRIGGS. I call attention to the report.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that the report, if there is a written report, be read. This was a preliminary reference to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection the report will be read.

The Secretary read the report this day submitted by Mr. BRIGGS, as follows:

This resolution as amended is reported to the Senate by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate with a favorable recommendation. In making this recommendation the committee disclaims any purpose to indicate whether the inquiry should be made or not; those matters being left, as they must be left, to the future action of the Senate, but intends by its action to provide the money necessary for this inquiry if an inquiry be made.

Mr. CULBERSON. Now, Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The resolution having been referred primarily to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate as a preliminary question, is it necessary for the Senate to adopt the report before it commits itself to the payment of this money, if the inquiry is ordered, out of the contingent fund of the Senate? In other words, I have no disposition to press the Senate for the consideration of the resolution without a reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but I want to have the preliminary question settled.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Naturally, objection being made to the present consideration of the resolution, it goes to the calendar; but on motion, the report of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate can be approved, and then the resolution and report referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he has any objection to the adoption of the report of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and then let the reference of the resolution be made to the Committee on Privileges and Elections?

Mr. LODGE. Not the slightest, if it is to be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. CULBERSON. That was my intention all the while.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate is approved, and the resolution, with the report, is referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The Chair hears no objection.

COURTS IN MISSISSIPPI AND MICHIGAN.

Mr. OVERMAN. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 19238) to amend section 90 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911. I call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If I understood the bill correctly, it relates to terms of court in the State of Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will explain to the Senator from Michigan just what the bill does. Last year an act was passed declaring that a term of the court should be held at Clarksdale, Miss., but the act did not designate the counties from which litigants should go to Clarksdale. This bill merely designates the counties from which litigants shall go to the different subdivisions of the northern judicial district.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to amend the bill by inserting, on page 4, after line 2, the following:

Provided, That an additional term of the United States District Court for the Western District of Michigan, northern division, shall be held at the city of Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., on the first Tuesdays in January and July of each year.

Mr. OVERMAN. I suggest to the Senator that he had better have another bill for that purpose, because this bill amends a section of the new code.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This bill is amendatory to an act which would have nothing to do with the courts in Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understand; but it is amendatory to the act providing for the terms of the Federal courts.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But it is amendatory to a special act which was passed February 24, 1911, establishing the holding of a Federal court at Clarksdale, Miss. I have no objection to the amendment, but I think—

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not understand why my amendment would not be germane.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let me suggest to the Senator from Michigan that in the judiciary code the court in Michigan is one section by itself, and to amend it in this way would disarrange the judiciary code very much. I should think that it could be done very well by a special bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I hope the Senator from North Carolina will not object.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am not objecting; I am merely making a suggestion to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is the desire of the district judge of the western district of Michigan to hold additional terms of court in the northern division of that district, and I have been hopeful I could get this amendment on a bill of this character where it would be germane and appropriate for that purpose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan. I merely said what I did in a suggestive way to him, thinking that perhaps upon investigation he would find that his amendment is not germane to this bill. But whether it is or not, I have no objection to it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am greatly obliged to the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from North Carolina, and I move the amendment which I have just indicated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator please give the dates to the Secretary?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. On the first Tuesdays in January and July in each year.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to inquire of the Senator if court is already held at that place.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is already held at Marquette, in the northern division of that district, but not at the city of Sault Ste. Marie, where much litigation arises growing out of the customs and immigration laws, and where it is regarded as important that two sessions should be held each year, without interfering, however, with the Marquette terms and solely for the convenience of attorneys and litigants.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think we ought to establish a court at a new place without consideration by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I assure the Senator from North Carolina that this only concerns the northern division of the western district of Michigan, where the territory is so large that it is impossible to economically administer the law as the courts are now conducted.

Mr. OVERMAN. There has never been a court at this point.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The court does not sit regularly at Sault Ste. Marie, but it does at Marquette and will continue to do so. It has been thought best to sit regularly at Sault Ste. Marie also.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is there a public building in the city where it is proposed the court shall sit?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, yes; there is every facility there, and no additional expense will be incurred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, after line 2, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That an additional term of the United States District Court for the Western District of Michigan, northern division, shall be held at Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., on the first Tuesdays in January and July in each year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to amend section 90 of the act entitled 'An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary,' approved March 3, 1911, and for other purposes."

ESTATE OF JOHN POOL.

Mr. OVERMAN. With the consent of the chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I ask that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of Senate resolution 69 authorizing the Secretary of the Senate to make payment to the estate of John Pool, a Senator from North Carolina, for services in the Fortieth Congress, and that it be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina asks that the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate be discharged from the further consideration of Senate resolution 69, and that it be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

A bill (S. 5642) granting an increase of pension to Albert F. Whitney (with accompanying paper);

A bill (S. 5643) granting a pension to Sibae S. Andrews (with accompanying paper);

A bill (S. 5644) granting an increase of pension to Isaac W. Hodsdon (with accompanying paper);

A bill (S. 5645) granting an increase of pension to Mary J. Foster (with accompanying paper); and

A bill (S. 5646) granting an increase of pension to James M. Lowell (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DILLINGHAM:

A bill (S. 5647) granting a pension to Henrietta V. Hawley (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHIVELY:

A bill (S. 5648) granting a pension to William N. Russell (with accompanying paper); and

A bill (S. 5649) granting an increase of pension to Ira Grant (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LODGE:

A bill (S. 5650) granting an increase of pension to Charles Bennett (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BROWN:

A bill (S. 5651) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Charles Haskin; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HITCHCOCK:

A bill (S. 5652) granting an increase of pension to Lurena J. Terrell; to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. ROOT submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to reopen, adjust, and audit the claim of the State of New York for interest on advances and expenditures made by that State in the War of 1812-15 with Great Britain, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DIXON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $2,573.25 to reimburse Omer D. Lewis, lease clerk at the Flathead Indian Agency, Mont., for expenses incurred for hospital and doctors' fees, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $75,000 for continuing construction of irrigation systems to irrigate the allotted lands of the Indians on the Fort Peck Indian Reservation, Mont., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $40,000 for the construction of buildings for agency purposes on the Flathead Indian Reservation, Mont., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for continuing the construction of irrigation systems to irrigate the allotted lands of the Indians of the Flathead Indian Reservation, Mont., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for continuing the construction of irrigation systems to irrigate the allotted lands of the Indians on the Blackfeet Indian Reservation, Mont., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN submitted an amendment proposing to strike out, in the clause in the proposed Army appropriation bill for additional pay to officers of the Army for length of service, the provision "that no money appropriated by this act shall be paid to any officer for any period during which he shall have been detached for any duty of any kind for more than four of the preceding six years from the organization in which he is commissioned," etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BORAH submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $10,000 for the establishment and maintenance of an agricultural experiment station near Jerome, Lincoln County, Idaho, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the agricultural appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

REPORT ON VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

Mr. BURNHAM submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 243), which was read and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry 3,000 additional copies, with covers, of Senate Report No. 405, Sixty-second Congress, second session, on the subject of vocational education.

GEORGE JONAS GLASS CO. V. GLASS BOTTLE BLOWERS' ASSOCIATION (S. DOC. NO. 374).

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, and also as a Senate document, the opinion of the Court of Errors and Appeals of the State of New Jersey in the case of George Jonas Glass Co. v. The Glass Bottle Blowers' Association of the United States and Canada et al., it being the opinion of Chancellor Pitney and the dissenting opinions of other judges in that court.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and the order is entered.

The order as agreed to was reduced to writing, as follows:

Ordered, That the opinion of the Court of Errors and Appeals of the State of New Jersey, at the March term, 1910, in the case of George Jonas Glass Co. complainant and respondent, v. The Glass Bottle Blowers' Association of the United States and Canada et al., defendants and appellants, including all dissenting opinions, be printed as a Senate document.

GEORGE JONAS GLASS CO., COMPLAINANT AND RESPONDENT, V. THE GLASS BOTTLE BLOWERS' ASSOCIATION OF THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA ET AL., DEFENDANTS AND APPELLANTS. (PRINTED OUT OF PLACE.—REP.) [Argued June 19, 1908; decided Nov. 16, 1908.]

1. An injunction sustained, restraining defendants from using either coercion or persuasion in order to bring about breaches of the contracts of personal service existing between complainant and its employees.
2. An injunction sustained against like conduct having for its object and purpose the termination of the relation of master and servant existing between complainant and its employees in cases where there was no binding contract of service, but a mere service at will.
3. An injunction sustained, restraining defendants from interfering, by coercion or personal molestation and annoyance, to prevent persons, not as yet employed but willing to take employment under the complainant, from entering such employment.
4. An injunction sustained against "picketing" designed to molest and annoy persons employed or willing to be employed by complainant.
5. An injunction against a "boycott" sustained.
6. The "act relative to persons combining and encouraging other persons to combine" (P. L., 1883, p. 36; Gen. Stat., p. 2344, pl. 23), does not legitimize an invasion of private rights, nor prevent the party injured from having full redress.

On appeal from a decree of the former chancellor advised by Vice Chancellor Bergen, whose opinion is reported in 72 N. J. Eq. (2 Buch.) 653.

Mr. John W. Wescott, Mr. Matthew Jefferson, and Mr. Louis H. Miller, for the appellants.

Mr. John W. Harding, for the respondent.

The opinion of the court was delivered by Pitney, chancellor.

The facts of the case are sufficiently outlined in the opinion of the learned vice chancellor. His findings are, in our judgment, fully sustained by the evidence.

The defendants comprise three classes of persons—first, the Glass Bottle Blowers' Association of the United States and Canada, a voluntary association, including in its membership nearly all the journeymen green glass bottle blowers of the United States and Canada; secondly, the officers of this association, who, as individuals, are made parties defendant; and thirdly, 90 or more individuals who were formerly in the employ of the complainant corporation at its glassworks in Minotola, in this State, and who on April 9, 1902, went upon strike.

It is undisputed that in the year 1901 the Glass Bottle Blowers' Association instituted a boycott of the complainant's wares in the effort to coerce complainant to conform its business to regulations prescribed by the association. The evidence renders it clear that this boycott was still in force and was being actively prosecuted by the association down to the time of the strike of 1902 and thereafter, and, indeed, after the filing of the bill of complaint herein.

Whether the defendant association or its officers directly instigated this strike possibly admits of doubt; but it is entirely clear that immediately after the strike began the association, through its executive committee and officers, took charge of it, organized and directed the strikers, and guided them in the subsequent proceedings.

There is abundant evidence that at the time the bill of complaint was filed and thereafter the association, its officers, and the strikers, who are joined as defendants, made common cause in a war of subjugation against the complainant corporation. While there are individual defendants who are not shown by the evidence to have been personally implicated in certain of the specific acts of violence and coercion that ensued, they were all acting in concert in the general plan of campaign, and are equally subject to injunction with respect to the unlawful acts that were done and threatened.

The final decree that is now under review awards an injunction restraining the defendants as follows:

First. From knowingly and intentionally causing or attempting to cause, by threats, offers of money, payments of money, offering to pay expenses, or by inducement or persuasion, any employee of the complainant under contract to render service to it to break such contract by quitting such service.

Second. From personal molestation of persons willing to be employed by complainant with intent to coerce such persons to refrain from entering such employment.

Third. From addressing persons willing to be employed by complainant, against their will, and thereby causing them personal annoyance, with a view to persuade them to refrain from such employment.

Fourth. From loitering or picketing in the streets or on the highways or public places near the premises of complainant with intent to procure the personal molestation and annoyance of persons employed or willing to be employed by complainant, and with a view to cause persons so employed to refrain from such employment.

Fifth. From entering the premises of the complainant against its will with intent to interfere with its business.

Sixth. From violence, threats of violence, insults, indecent talk, abusive epithets, annoying language, acts or conduct, practiced upon any persons without their consent, with intent to coerce them to refrain from entering the employment of complainant or to leave its employment.

Seventh. From attempting to cause any persons employed by complainant to leave such employment by intimidating or annoying such employees by annoying language, acts, or conduct.

Eighth. From causing persons willing to be employed by complainant to refrain from so doing by annoying language, acts, or conduct.

Ninth. From inducing, persuading, or causing or attempting to induce, persuade, or cause the employees of complainant to break their contracts of service with complainant or quit their employment.

Tenth. From threatening to injure the business of any corporation, customer, or person dealing or transacting business and willing to deal and transact business with the complainant, by making threats in writing or by words for the purpose of coercing such corporation, customer, or person against his or its will so as not to deal with or transact business with the complainant.

Each portion of the injunctive relief thus granted is directed to some manifestation of the strife that was carried on by the combined defendants against the complainant. And in each respect the injunction is justified by the evidence in the case.

The employees of complainant referred to in the decree are those who either refused to join the strike or who entered complainant's employ after the strike. With respect to these, it will be observed that the defendants are restrained from using coercion, inducements, or persuasion to bring about a termination of the employment, whether the employee be under contract of service or not.

With respect to other persons not as yet employed but willing to take employment under the complainant, the defendants are restrained from interfering to prevent this by coercion or personal molestation and annoyance, but are not restrained from using mere persuasion in such a case.

There is a restraint against picketing designed to molest and annoy persons employed or willing to be employed.

And there is a restraint against the continuance of the boycott.

It is clear beyond dispute that the complainant has suffered grievously in its property and business through the acts of the defendants, whose continuance is thus prohibited. That the injury to the complainant is irreparable by action at law is likewise clear.

If, therefore, the acts themselves are unlawful and violative of the property rights of the complainant, the injunction is proper.

The conduct of defendants in using coercion in some cases and persuasion in others in order to bring about breaches of the contracts of personal service existing between complainant and some of its employees—defendants having, of course, full notice of the existing employment—was unlawful and actionable upon well-settled principles. (3 Bl. Com., 142; Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl., 216, 224; Bowen v. Hall, 6 Q. B. Div., 333; Angle v. Chicago, &c., Railway Co., 151 U. S., 1, 13.)

And the same is true of conduct whose object and purpose were to bring about a termination of the relation of master and servant between the complainant and its employees in cases where there was no binding contract of service, but a mere service at will. (Noice, Administratrix, v. Brown, 39 N. J. Law (10 Vr.), 569, 572; Brennan v. United Hatters, 73 N. J. Law (44 Vr.), 729, 743.)

In Frank & Dugan v. Herold (63 N. J. Eq. (18 Dick.), 443, 450), Vice Chancellor Pitney said that to create the relation of master and servant it is not necessary that there should be a contract in writing, or even verbal, between them to work for any particular length of time; that the relation exists when the one person is willing from day to day to work for another, and that other person desires the labor and makes his business arrangements accordingly.

Whether an action will lie for interference in the relations existing between employer and employee where there is a mere service at will, and where the interference is the result of fair competition in the labor market, is a question mooted but not necessary to be decided in the present case. The defendants were not competitors in the labor market. Their interference had for its immediate object the crippling of the complainant's business. The only semblance of excuse alleged is that defendants desired to bring about "improved labor conditions" in complainant's works; but this object did not warrant the resort to unlawful measures.

Reliance is placed by the defendants upon the "act relative to persons combining and encouraging other persons to combine." (P. L., 1883, p. 36; Gen. Stat., p. 2344, pl. 23.) The enactment is:

"That it shall not be unlawful for any two or more persons to unite, combine, or bind themselves by oath, covenant, agreement, alliance, or otherwise, to persuade, advise, or encourage, by peaceable means, any person or persons to enter into any combination for or against leaving or entering into the employment of any person, persons, or corporation."

In Mayer v. Journeymen Stonecutters' Association (47 N. J. Eq. (2 Dick.), 519, 531), Vice Chancellor Green apparently treated this act as legalizing private injuries. And in Cumberland Glass Manufacturing Co. v. Glass Bottle Blowers' Association (59 N. J. Eq. (14 Dick.), 49, 53), Vice Chancellor Reed construed it as permitting the adoption of peaceable measures for inducing workmen to quit or to refuse to enter an employment. Whatever may have been the purpose of its framer, there are, as we think, constitutional obstacles in the way of giving the act so extensive a force. The rights of enjoying and defending life and liberty, acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and pursuing and obtaining safety and happiness, are declared by our constitution to be unalienable. (N. J. Const., art. I, pl. 1.) No act of the legislature is to be construed as infringing upon these rights unless its language plainly and clearly requires such a construction. If its language so reads, it is to the extent indicated unconstitutional and void. The act of 1883 is, as we think, properly to be treated as merely rendering the combination no longer indictable; in effect, as repealing the rule laid down by the supreme court of this State in State v. Donaldson (32 N. J. Law (3 Vr.), 151). It does not legitimize an invasion of private rights nor prevent the party injured from having full redress. Its proper scope is indicated in the opinion of Vice Chancellor Pitney in Frank & Dugan v. Herold. (63 N. J. Eq. (18 Dick.), 443, 447, 448.)

So much of the decree as awards an injunction to restrain the defendants from using coercive measures to prevent the flow of labor to complainant's works is likewise proper. In Jersey City Printing Co. v. Cassidy (63 N. J. Eq. (18 Dick.), 759, 765), Vice Chancellor Stevenson recognized and enforced the right of an employer to an injunction to prevent undue interference with those who wish to come to him for employment. It is principally upon this ground that injunctions against what is known as picketing have been sustained in this and other jurisdictions.

So much of the decree as is directed against the continuance of the boycott is plainly justified by the evidence and accords with the law. (Barr v. Essex Trades Council, 53 N. J. Eq. (8 Dick.), 101; Martin v. McFall, 65 N. J. Eq. (20 Dick.), 91; Temperton v. Russell (1893), 1 Q. B. Div., 715; Quinn v. Leathem (1901), A. C. 495.)

The decree under review should be affirmed, with costs.

Minturn, J. (dissenting):

I find myself unable to agree with the majority of my brethren with respect to that portion of the decree of the court of chancery which authorizes the issuing of an injunction against these defendants upon the ground stated in the opinion of the learned chancellor speaking for the majority of this court, viz: "Inducing, persuading, or causing or attempting to induce, persuade, or cause the employees of complainant to break their contracts of service with complainant or quit their employment."

It may be conceded since the decision of this court in Brennan v. United Hatters (73 N. J. Law (44 Vr.), 729) that an ordinary wage employee bears toward his employer in this State a relation in modern legal nomenclature denominated as a "service at will"; and for the breach of which an action at law can be maintained.

Still with this concession it is difficult to discern in jurisprudence, outside of the sphere of those English cases which bear the distinct impress of feudal law and custom, any consensus of legal authority which can support the principle upon which this injunction rests; and of those cases Chief Justice Parker, speaking for the New York Court of Appeals, said "they are hostile not only to the statute law of this country, but to the spirit of our institutions." (National Protective Association v. Cuming, 170 N. Y., 332.)

Their origin is traceable distinctly to that class legislation which followed the emancipation of the villeins under the feudal tenure; and to the scourge of the "black death" which followed such emancipation in the reign of Edward III, decimating Europe and culminating in what is known as "the statute of laborers" (22-23 Edw. III), by virtue of which every vestige of individual freedom to contract and to combine was shorn from the wage worker and his social status was reduced by legislative act to that of a bondman. (1 Green's History of the English People, sec. 4; 2 Bouv., p. 100.)

Our inheritance of English common law carried with it only such of the English decisions as are consonant with our institutions and our public policy. (1 Kent Com., p. 343.)

Concededly, therefore, the invocation of a line of adjudications emanating from a social order and a political environment radically different from our own, founded upon the feudal concept of "a service at will" in an age of enlightened citizenship, is so utterly repugnant to and incompatible with our basic governmental theory, res populi vox Dei, as to be unsupportable in reason, and opposed to any system of enlightened jurisprudence, which invokes as a justification for its existence either the dictates of reason or the wisdom, the experience, or the service of humanity. "Precedents against law or reason," says Lieber, "must be set aside." (Legal and Political Hermeneutics, 219); and so, Coke, "Qua Contra rationem juris introductor sunt, non debent trahi in consequentiam." (The case of the Proclamations, 12 Coke's Rep., 74.)

The constitutional guarantees, State and Federal as well as the bill of rights, reach their protecting arm not only to property rights, but also to the rights of citizenship and free speech. And while in the march of human progress and national development, the protection of property representing as it does the thrift, economy, and energy of a people, is not to be underestimated; still the right to life and liberty has, from the dawn of history, been the potent and dominant factor in the forward march of progress and civilization. (Spence Social Stat. ch. 5; Guizot Hist. of Civ. in Europe, ch. 2.)

Force or intimidation can never be recognized as a lawful modus operandi in the propagation of any doctrine or cult, or for the assertion or prosecution of any right; and to the vindication of this principle the unanimous decisions, both State and Federal, bear testimony.

But in the effort to sustain the property guaranties of the fundamental law against infraction, we are apt to lose sight of those guaranties of liberty and happiness which are equally fundamental; and if a concrete case were needed to illustrate this tendency, we find it in the case at bar.

A statute enacted by the legislature of this State and quoted verbatim by the learned chancellor (P. L., 1883, p. 36) made it lawful for "any two or more persons to unite, combine, or bind themselves to persuade, advise, or encourage, by peaceable means, any person or persons to enter into any combination for or against leaving or entering into the employment of any person or persons or corporation." Assuming that this relationship of a service at will is to be dignified with the status of a formal contract inter partes, then concededly the terms of this statute must be read into it. (2 Kent Com., 571.)

Upon two occasions, at least, this statute has been construed by the court of chancery, not only as relieving such combination of the criminal aspect theretofore ascribed to it, but also as a legislative declaration of public policy, and presumably sub silentio, the learned vice chancellors who passed upon the legal effect of the enactment found nothing unconstitutional in its provisions.

Thus, Vice Chancellor Green in Mayer v. Journeymen Stone Cutters' Association (47 N. J. Eq. (2 Dick.), 519) refused to order the issue of an injunction upon the ground that "the acts threatened are declared by statute as not unlawful." He characterized the act of 1883 as declaring "a policy of the law" which, in his judgment, has "revolutionized" the common-law doctrine of unlawful combination, and concluded his judgment with the statement that the peaceable intervention contemplated by this act was "unoffensive to any provision of our law."

Vice Chancellor Reed reviewed the same legislation in Cumberland Glass Manufacturing Co. v. Glass Bottle Blowers' Association (59 N. J. Eq. (14 Dick.), 49) and stated, "The words are perhaps broad enough to legalize a combination to persuade individual workmen to quit, or refuse to enter the service of any person," and refused the injunction on that ground, but granted it on another.

Vice Chancellor Pitney's opinion in Frank & Dugan v. Herold (63 N. J. Eq. (18 Dick.), 443) marks the turning point in the construction of this statute, for he there held that it only relieved an act formerly criminal, of its unlawful character, and then dealt with the subject sub judice from a constitutional point of view and declared, "It is argued that one person has a right to persuade another to work or not to work. That may be if the other is willing to listen and be persuaded" (at p. 449), and again (at p. 452), "The operatives have the right which their employers can not complain of to consider the question whether they desire to work for them any longer and for that purpose they have the right to listen to arguments on that subject."

Vice Chancellor Stevenson in Jersey City Printing Co. v. Cassidy (63 N. J. Eq. (18 Dick.), 765), following the consideration given by Vice Chancellor Pitney to the statute, termed this service at will "a newly recognized right" and defined it to be "that peculiar element that is an interest which one man has in the freedom of another;" which he further defined as "freedom in the market; freedom in the purchase and sale of all things, including both goods and labor;" a right, says the learned vice chancellor, "that our modern law is endeavoring to insure to every dealer" (at p. 766).

Still later in Fletcher Co. v. International Association of Machinists (55 Atl. Rep., 1077), the same learned vice chancellor conceded the right to workmen to organize and use peaceable persuasion, substantially as Vice Chancellor Pitney had conceded it in the Herold case. But in both determinations the learned vice chancellor makes the right to "the free flow of labor," as he termed it, the ratio decidendi, thus instituting an analogy as an economic proposition between goods and merchandise and labor; a fallacy all the more confounding to any attempt at harmonious decision when the statutory enactment in question is disregarded.

The analogy ignores the constitutional guaranty of freedom of speech and freedom of the press representing labor's demands, because labor, unlike goods, can not be severed from the human entity and be considered apart from the man, for as Locke says, "Every man has a property in his own person; this nobody has a right to but himself." (Essay on the Human Understanding, ch. 6.) It ignores factory and inspection laws, child-labor laws, and those legislative protective enactments for workshop and factory intended to mitigate the hardship incident to the application of the legal rule of assumption of risk, all of which are proper subjects for discussion between fellow workmen, with a view to enforcing compliance by the employer with the law as the alternative to a strike. It ignores the fact that in every line of trade and business combination is the tendency of the age, and that in this State our corporation act is designed to accomplish that very purpose, and has accomplished it to a great extent throughout the land. The maxim that "competition is the life of trade" is not contained in the lexicon of the political economy of this day, and eminent jurists have noted the fact of its elimination as an axiom in commercial life—except, it would seem, in its application to the wages of labor, in which event the law of supply and demand and the creation of a free labor market, as indicated by the learned vice chancellor, practically relegates the wage earner to the status of a chattel, and corresponds to the judicial conception entertained of black labor in the Dred Scott case. (Dred Scott v. Sandford, 19 How., 393.) In the case at bar the learned chancellor goes further and declares the act of 1883 to be unconstitutional in its application to private rights as in contravention of article 1, page 1, of the State constitution. It certainly would be indefensible, tested by this constitutional guaranty, if it empowered these defendants to combine to destroy property or to combine for any other unlawful purpose. But such is not its intent, since it simply empowers a number to do what it would be perfectly lawful for one to do, and such a power has been repeatedly held to be constitutional. (National Protective Association v. Cummings, 170 N. Y., 315; Wabash Railroad v. Hannahan, 121 Fed. Rep., 563; Martell v. White, 185 Mass., 255.)

The right conferred is in essence only the fundamental right of free speech, and the sole limitation upon that natural right is that those exercising it "are answerable only for their acts in the interests of good citizenship, morality, and decency." (United States v. Williams, 194 U. S., 279; Roberts v. Baldwin, 166 U. S., 261; Wise v. C. I., 189.)

It is to be noted that this constitutional provision is but a paraphrase of the provision upon the same subject contained in the bill of rights; and it is to be observed that when that great charter was promulgated a crisis was impending, in which the great desideratum was not the right to enjoy property, but the right to enjoy personal liberty, and to pursue individual happiness without regal interference. That document provided "that all men are by nature equally free, independent, and have certain inherent rights of which, when they enter into a state of society, they can not by any compact deprive or divest their posterity, namely, the enjoyment of life and liberty with the means of acquiring and possessing property and pursuing happiness and safety." (Revised Code of Virginia (1819), vol. 1, p. 31.)

This conception of life and liberty has dominated all other considerations in the development of constitutional law; and has led the United States Supreme Court in furtherance of its application under the police power to ignore the fact that judicial recognition of it was tantamount to the destruction of the private property involved. (Slaughter House cases, 83 U. S., 36; Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S., 814; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S., 623.)

But the denial of this right to combine in furtherance of free speech implies such a discrimination against these defendants that it may, with perfect propriety, be argued that their rights as citizens are denied to them in contravention of the fourteenth amendment of the Federal Constitution, which guarantees that their privileges and immunities as citizens shall not be abridged. (Senator v. West Virginia, 100 U. S., 303; 1 Kent Com., 621.)

In other jurisdictions, the correct rule is declared to be in consonance with the spirit and language of the statute of 1883. Thus the Virginia supreme court of appeal has declared that it is "not unlawful for strikers to persuade employees to leave the service of their employer or to dissuade other workmen from seeking employment with him" when unaccompanied by force or intimidation. (Everett Waddy Co. v. Richmond Typographical Union et al., 105 Va., 188; National Protective Association v. Cummings, 170 N. Y., 315; Jones v. Van Winkle Machine Works (Georgia Supreme Court), 628 E. R., 236; 8 Anno. Cases, 796, and cases cited; 24 Cyc., 831, and cases cited.)

It may be appropriate to conclude this reference by quoting an extract from the opinion of Judge Taft, sitting in the United States circuit court in Phelan's case (62 Fed. Rep., 803): "The employees of the receiver have the right to organize into or join a labor union which would take action as to the terms of their employment. The officers they appoint or any other person they choose to listen to may advise them as to the proper course to be taken in regard to their common employment, or if they choose to appoint anyone he may order them on pain of expulsion from the union peaceably to leave the employment of their employer, because any of the terms of the employment are unsatisfactory."

The act of 1883 confers no greater privileges upon these defendants than does the language of this eminent jurist, and if that act be condemned by the constitutional guaranties referred to by the learned chancellor, this pronouncement must suffer the same animadversion.

It is conceivable that substantial justice could have been effectuated in this case without entrenching upon the constitutional privileges of these defendants, for in the final analysis, says Montesquieu, "Justice is but a relation of congruity which really subsists between two things. This relation is always the same, whatever being considers it; whether it be God, an angel, or, lastly, a man." (Spirit of the Law, ch. 6.)

Entertaining these views, I shall vote to reverse and modify the decree accordingly.

Garrison, J. (dissenting).

In so far as the decree appealed from directs that the defendants be enjoined from the peaceable persuasion of persons who are not under any contract to serve the complainant, I think the court below was in error, and that to that extent its decree should be reversed.

I am requested by Justice Swayze and by Judge Bogert to say that they concur in the foregoing view.

For affirmance—The Chancellor, Chief Justice, Reed, Trenchard, Parker, Voorhees, Vredenburg, Vroom, Green, Gray—10.

For reversal—Garrison, Swayze, Minturn, Bogert—4.

HOOR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. LODGE. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to.

GENERAL ARBITRATION TREATIES.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, apropos of the motion just agreed to, I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry. I notice that unanimous consent was given some days ago to vote on the British and French arbitration treaties on Tuesday, the 5th instant. I should like to inquire whether, under this unanimous-consent agreement, that will be the first business taken up in the morning?

The VICE PRESIDENT. After the morning business.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is, it will be taken up after the routine morning business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. After the routine morning business.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like also to inquire whether there is any limitation as to debate included in the unanimous-consent agreement?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no limitation as to debate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senate will sit as usual, with these treaties before it, and a vote must be taken before adjournment on that legislative day?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I desire now to give notice that I shall offer as a substitute for the amendments pending a motion to strike out of the treaties the third paragraph of article 3.

Mr. LODGE. That amendment is now pending. It is the pending amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The committee's amendment?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts does not take the place of that amendment?

Mr. LODGE. What I propose is the resolution of ratification. That has nothing to do with the amendment of the treaty.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Who is sponsor for the committee's motion?

Mr. LODGE. The committee. I reported it on behalf of the committee.

Mr. CULLOM. The majority of the committee.

Mr. LODGE. On behalf of the majority of the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I presume, if that motion is pending, it will be called up by some member of the committee?

Mr. LODGE. It is the pending question. It is the committee amendment to the treaty, and is the first question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. So that we shall vote on that first?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

THE LAWRENCE (MASS.) STRIKE.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] informs me that he is willing to withdraw the objection which he made to my request for unanimous consent for the consideration of Senate resolution 231, with the amendment which I proposed on Saturday. In view of that, I now ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. BRISTOW. I inquire if morning business is closed?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 231, providing for an investigation and report by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor regarding certain labor conditions in Lawrence, Mass.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HEYBURN. Do I understand that morning business has been concluded?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is not concluded.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to call up another matter.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I move the adoption of the resolution with the amendment which I have proposed, notwithstanding the objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That motion is not in order until morning business is concluded. The Chair will recognize the Senator later.

PRESIDENTIAL TERM.

Mr. WORKS. I desire to give notice that on next Monday, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business, I will, with the permission of the Senate, submit some remarks on Senate joint resolution 78, proposing an amendment to the Constitution fixing the term of office of the President of the United States at six years.

POLITICAL ACTIVITY OF FEDERAL EMPLOYEES.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to offer a resolution, but before doing so I ask to have read the letter which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary proceeded to read the letter, and read as follows:

BESSEMER, ALA., February 24, 1912.

Mr. W. J. MARLES,

Post-Office Inspector, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I am in receipt of your letter dated February 17, purporting to have been mailed me from Washington, D. C., when in fact the envelope in which the letter was contained shows the post-office stamp of Birmingham, Ala., and the fact that I saw you in person on the day this letter was written shows that it was not written in Washington but written since you came to Alabama. You state in your letter that "charges of pernicious political activity have been preferred against you" (me), and you graciously give me an opportunity to make any statement that I may desire for consideration of the department.

The "pernicious political activity," as you term it, is stated in your letter to have been committed by me in May, 1911, and in December, 1910. It is a fact pregnant with meaning that you should appear in Birmingham two days after I, as a member of the Republican congressional executive committee of this district, saw proper to exercise my right as a free American citizen and to vote for resolutions indorsing Theodore Roosevelt for President. It is also strange, if not a matter pregnant with meaning, that you should appear personally in this district to investigate a postmaster about matters occurring more than 12 months before, not only on the day but at the very hour when a political meeting was being held in this city, when it is a matter of public notoriety that the Federal officeholders in the Southern States, and especially the State of Alabama, are a mass of seething political activity.

It is a matter further pregnant with meaning that while you are here in this community in person that you should shut your eyes to the most flagrant examples of "pernicious political activity" in behalf of President Taft.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I should like to know what the document is that is being read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a letter presented by the Senator from Kansas, who asked unanimous consent that it be read prior to his introducing a resolution.

Mr. BRISTOW. It is a letter from a postmaster in Alabama, I will advise the Senator, written to a post-office inspector.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is rather an extraordinary thing to have a letter of that kind read in the Senate, and I feel constrained to object. The Senator from Kansas can read it himself, if he pleases, but I think it is a very bad practice to have letters from individuals, whether they are postmasters or not, arraigning the President of the United States and the administration, read in the open Senate without objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the further reading of the document.

Mr. BRISTOW. As preliminary to the offering of the resolution I will read the letter myself.

It is a matter further—

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President I suggest that the Senator read the whole letter. It is very interesting.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator had better begin at the beginning, so that we can get the connection.

Mr. BRISTOW. Very well. The letter is as follows:

BESSEMER, ALA., February 24, 1912.

Mr. W. J. MARLES,

Post-Office Inspector, Washington, D. C.

The "pernicious political activity," as you term it, is stated in your letter to have been committed by me in May, 1911, and in December, 1910. It is a fact pregnant with meaning that you should appear in Birmingham two days after I, as a member of the Republican congressional executive committee of this district, saw proper to exercise my right as a free American citizen and to vote for resolutions indorsing Theodore Roosevelt for President. It is also strange, if not a matter pregnant with meaning, that you should appear personally in this district to investigate a postmaster about matters occurring more than 12 months before, not only on the day but at the very hour when a political meeting was being held in this city, when it is a matter of public notoriety that the Federal officeholders in the Southern States, and especially the State of Alabama, are a mass of seething political activity.

It is a matter further pregnant with meaning that while you are here in this community in person that you should shut your eyes to the most flagrant examples of "pernicious political activity" in behalf of President Taft, while you direct the searchlight of your investigations along these lines only against a few postmasters who have expressed a preference for Roosevelt. If you cared to extend your investigations along lines of "political activity," you could, and can now, easily ascertain that on the night before the meeting of the Republican congressional executive committee of this district Truman H. Aldrich, postmaster in Birmingham, Ala., although not a member of the committee, held a caucus in his office in the post-office building in this city, which lasted far into the night on the night before the committee meeting, at which were present other postmasters, members of the committee, and other officials. It is a matter of common knowledge that passersby near the hour of midnight could hear discussions and speeches being made in his office by partisans of President Taft. It is also a matter of common knowledge, well known to the public, that said Postmaster Truman H. Aldrich attended in person in Magnolia Hall, in Birmingham, Ala., the meeting of the Republican district executive committee and was seated on the floor of the committee, and when it was developed on the roll call that 16 members of the committee stood in favor of indorsing Roosevelt for President and 11 members were opposed, that in conjunction with those 11 members said Aldrich got up in the meeting and withdrew with them from the floor of the committee, and at the time of his withdrawal became so excited that he shook his fist at a member of the committee and stated to him that he "would settle with him outside." In addition to this, said Aldrich has been writing letters to postmasters and others over this district, endeavoring to line them up in opposition to Col. Roosevelt and in favor of President Taft. Right here I will give you a sample by a quotation from one of Aldrich's letters: "We are counting on you to be with us and for the Taft administration. There is a scheme on foot which I will explain to you when I see you. Do not commit yourself to Brother Lewis until I have a personal talk with you."

If you are desirous of pursuing this investigation as "pernicious political activity" in an unbiased way along proper and legitimate lines, you can easily ascertain, and I shall furnish you witnesses from whom you can ascertain the facts, that on the morning before the meeting of said committee in Birmingham two postmasters—N. L. Wilson, of Blocton, Ala., and N. C. Fuller, of Centerville, Ala.—members of the committee, came to the law office of Judge Oscar R. Hundley, in the city of Birmingham, Ala., where one A. L. Elam, a member of the committee from Bibb County, was in consultation with said Hundley and other friends of Col. Roosevelt, when they requested a private interview with said Elam, and Judge Hundley very graciously tendered a room in his office where they could have their private interview; and thereupon these two postmasters, by persuasion and promises of official favor, endeavored to get said Elam to change his allegiance to Col. Roosevelt and side with them, the said postmasters, in their effort to have this committee indorse the candidacy of President Taft.

If, under your oath of office, you desire to pursue this laudable purpose of yours to prevent "political activity" to its legitimate and proper conclusion, you will extend your investigation to one P. D. Barker, postmaster at Mobile, Ala., whose frequent absences from his official duties at Mobile have occasioned comment and criticism throughout the State of Alabama, and who now is engaged in writing letters to various postmasters over the State asking them to line up in their indorsement of President Taft for reelection; and in one of these letters he states, in substance, that "Roosevelt has no idea of being a candidate for President, but is simply pretending to run in order to get Taft committed to his candidacy in 1916, and that this will be arranged in a few days, when Roosevelt will come out and indorse Taft." Since you take exception to an interview of mine made more than 12 months ago, and while we are on this subject of interviews, I direct your attention to the fact that this same postmaster, P. D. Barker, who claims to be the mouthpiece of President Taft, has been for some time past keeping the press of this State warm with his partisan and political views in favor of President Taft and against Col. Roosevelt, even going so far as to use sarcastic and ungentle references to the latter. Let me quote for your information a small portion of an interview from this postmaster sage, P. D. Barker, which was published broadcast throughout the Democratic press during the New York State election, when Secretary Stimson was the Republican candidate:

"It seems to be in the air all over New York that the Democratic ticket will make a clean sweep," said Mr. Barker. "Mind you," he continued, "such a victory will not be a Democratic triumph so much as an anti-Roosevelt victory. Things are in a terrible mess among the Republicans in New York. There undoubtedly is a great revulsion of sentiment among the big business men of both parties against the agitation Col. Roosevelt has been conducting recently, and they seem to have decided that now is the time to give the rebuke and not wait until 1912."

But again, Mr. Inspector, permit me to return to Postmaster Truman H. Aldrich, of Birmingham. You had scarcely shaken the dust of Birmingham off your feet, if you were in reality not indeed in Birmingham at the time, when there was a Republican precinct election in this city, at which said Aldrich was either present or within close and advisory touch. Four of the members taking part in this meeting were letter carriers serving under said Aldrich and participated in the adoption of the following resolution:

"We, etc., indorse the administration of Maj. Truman H. Aldrich, postmaster of Birmingham, because of the fair deal he has given us, and the actions of the referees, Mr. Pope M. Long and Maj. P. D. Barker. We also express our confidence in William Howard Taft and declare ourselves in favor of his re-nomination."

This action has received editorial condemnation by the local press and has, indeed, tended to "cause public scandal" as to said Aldrich. I have written the above, Mr. Inspector, for your information as a public official, in order that you may have proper and official notice of such flagrant exercise of "pernicious political activity" by Federal officeholders who are supporting President Taft, since you told me, when I asked you why you did not extend your investigations further, "that no charges had been made against any others."

Now, to answer specifically the charges in your letter: In reply to your first charge that I, on May 20, 1911, wrote a letter to a rural letter carrier, who is in the classified service, in an effort to secure his cooperation in controlling the political situation at that time, and that I wrote another letter on May 26, 1911, to a civil-service employee of the same purport, I beg to say I did not write to a rural carrier on May 20, 1911, unless he was a member of a political committee, a place he had no right to fill under the rules of the Civil Service Commission. I do not remember writing a letter to a civil-service employee of the Birmingham office in which anything was said about politics. At any rate, the issue in that matter was not a strictly political one. It was simply a personal contest between two Republican officials, and was more a personal preference than a political contest, as simply the personal ambitions and interests of one was pitted against the other.

The second charge, that my time, which should be devoted to the post office, has to a large extent been utilized in preparing and circulating political literature, is not true. I have never asked my assistant to neglect his work for me, and the services of other employees have never been utilized by me for any purpose other than that of the discharge of their official duties. My assistant did some typewriting for the secretary of the district committee at a time when it did not in any way interfere with his official duties in the post office. I have devoted my time assiduously and conscientiously to the discharge of my official duties. I may have written some letter to some friend discussing my views upon the questions of the day, which, with all due respect, I think I have a right to do.

As to your third charge, in reference to my interview published in Washington Herald December 24, 1910, more than 12 months ago, I will state in passing that it is marvelously strange that this charge, based upon my conduct published in a public newspaper issued from the National Capital and under the eye of the President, should have laid dormant all this time and not have been investigated until two days after I cast a vote to indorse Theodore Roosevelt for President. As to that interview, I was incorrectly quoted in this interview, and I mailed to the secretary of the President a true version of same. I said that I considered Harmon a strong man, and, if nominated, I was apprehensive as to the result. The other interviews were in self-defense and in answer to attacks made on me in my absence. I know of nothing in that interview which would show I was trying to "control political movements, to neglect public duties, or to cause public scandal," as can be easily established as to the numerous interviews of said Postmaster P. D. Barker.

This letter is written you in no spirit of factious criticism, but simply as a plain statement of an American citizen and taxpayer who feels that he has a right to have all of the laws equally administered to all people alike. This letter is not written to be kept by you as a confidential official document, but you are at liberty to give it to the public if you so desire, a right which I shall claim to exercise if, in my judgment, I deem it proper to do so. I am also sending a copy of this letter to President Taft and also to the Civil Service Commission.

With very great respect, I have the honor to remain,

Respectfully,

GEORGE R. LEWIS,
Postmaster, Bessemer, Ala.

P. S.—Since writing the above, Mr. Inspector, to show you the "pernicious political activity" of certain class of Republicans in this community, I have just ascertained and make the charge to be that Frank McAlpine and Robert Sims, letter carriers in the Birmingham post office, together with Postmaster Truman H. Aldrich, were elected February 17 in Birmingham, Ala., as delegates from beat 37, Mr. Aldrich's beat, to a county convention which met in Birmingham to-day, and all three attended said convention to-day.

Respectfully,

GEORGE R. LEWIS,
Postmaster, Bessemer, Ala.

Now, Mr. President, from this letter it would be inferred that post-office inspectors were being sent as political agents in violation of the law, and I therefore submit the following resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas presents a Senate resolution, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 242), as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads is hereby authorized and directed, by subcommittee or otherwise, to inquire into and report to the Senate at the earliest date practicable whether post-office inspectors are being sent through the country as political emissaries to influence postmasters to aid in the election of delegates for or against any candidate for the Presidency; also to inquire into and report to the Senate whether postmasters with good official records are being threatened, directly or indirectly, with removal or discipline if they give or fail to give their support to certain candidates for delegates to national conventions or for the Presidency; also to inquire into and report to the Senate the truth or falsity of the reports that certain nominations for postmaster that were made to the Senate on various dates and withdrawn on February 19, 1912, were withdrawn for the purpose of influencing the action of certain politicians in the State of North Carolina in regard to holding conventions and electing delegates to the Republican national convention of 1912; and for this purpose they are authorized to sit during the session of Congress, at such times and places as they may deem desirable or practicable; to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, to conduct hearings, and have reports of same printed for use, and to employ such clerks, stenographers, and other assistants as shall be necessary; and any expense in connection with such inquiry shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BRISTOW. Since the Senate is a part of the appointing power and it is necessary for it to ratify any nominations that are made, it seems to me the Senate ought to have the information the resolution calls for. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Contingent Expenses, as is necessary under the law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I was very much interested in the letter which has just been read by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW]. All of it appeared to be in typewriting, with a typewritten signature, and so forth. I ask the Senator if he has in his possession the original from which this purports to be taken?

Mr. BRISTOW. I will state to the Senator from Wyoming that I have not. The original—

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Then I will ask the Senator if he has seen the original?

Mr. BRISTOW. I have not. I understand the original is in the possession of the post-office inspectors.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask the Senator, he having read the letter into the Record, whether he knows that the letter was written by the man by whom it is purported to have been written and whether it was written to the man to whom it is supposed to be addressed?

Mr. BRISTOW. I have no doubt at all about it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator has his copy from somebody who has authentic information?

Mr. BRISTOW. I have no doubt at all about it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The letter has been read into the Record with great seriousness, and we should have some information as to who wrote it and to whom it was addressed.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the resolution proposed by me is passed, we will find out exactly how much truth there is in the accusations made against the postmaster at Bessemer.

LAWRENCE (MASS.) LABOR STRIKE.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I renew the motion I made for the adoption of Senate resolution 231, with all after the semicolon stricken out.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator says it will result in no debate, that it is merely a matter of putting the resolution before the Senate, I will consent not to urge an objection. But I reserve the right to object if debate should occur.

Mr. GALLINGER. It will lead to some debate, I will assure the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then I shall have to make objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the present consideration of the resolution.

SENATOR FROM WISCONSIN.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 299.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho calls up the following as a privileged matter.

Mr. HEYBURN. As a privileged matter.

The SECRETARY. Resolution 299, directing the Committee on Privileges and Elections to investigate certain charges relative to the election of ISAAC STEPHENSON.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending motion is that of the Senator from Idaho that the report of the committee be adopted.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, after the exhaustive review of the evidence in this matter by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], I do not propose to go further into detail as to the evidence. There are some observations in relation to this matter and especially with relation to the legal aspect thereof that I do desire to discuss.

It may have seemed that the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] was perhaps pushing the matter a little faster than some of us thought it should be pushed, but I believe he is right in asking as speedy a consideration of this matter as circumstances will justify, in fairness to those who may want to discuss the case. If the charges of corrupt practice are untrue, then Senator STEPHENSON should be quickly vindicated; if true, he should quickly be expelled or the election be declared illegal and void.

I am not unmindful of the unpleasantness of the task or duty of urging that the methods by which a man was elected to this body constitute corrupt practices. It is no pleasant duty to so claim, especially where the occupant is of the advanced years of the junior Senator from Wisconsin. I believe those of the minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, much as they disliked to file the report which they did file, were amply justified by the record in this case.

Nor is it a pleasant duty on this side of the Chamber to urge that a member of your own political party has been elected to the Senate by corrupt methods and practices. Some of the minority of that political faith, joining with some of the minority of the Democratic faith, believed from a study of this record that the methods employed in the Wisconsin election should not be countenanced by this body.

It is not an unkind thing, as has been suggested, to raise this question. It may be considered by some unkind to have had any investigation. If this matter is to be determined on the question of whether we shall be kind or unkind, then nothing, perhaps, need be said. It was not exactly kind possibly to suggest, as is suggested in the opinion of the majority, as appears on page 19 of the report:

Were a candidate for a State office in Wisconsin to conduct a campaign in the manner in which the campaign of Mr. STEPHENSON, and of other men who sought election to the United States Senate, were conducted, it would be very difficult to justify such conduct under the laws of the State.

It was, perhaps, not kind—

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Where, in the opinion of the majority, does the Senator find that language?

Mr. KENYON. I find it on page 19 in the opinion of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN].

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator said "in the opinion of the majority."

Mr. KENYON. Possibly I was in error. In the opinion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]—

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator permit me to trespass only to point out that the statement distinguishing between the effect of an act by one candidate under the State laws and by one candidate under the national law justifies the expression referred to by the Senator from Iowa. It is obvious that the State of Wisconsin having a law relating to offices under the jurisdiction of the State making penal or a subject of forfeiture of office the doing of certain things, they would not have the jurisdiction or the power to make it penal or the subject of forfeiture of office as applied to a candidate elected under laws over which the State had no jurisdiction. That statement in the report which I had the honor to make is intended to go no further than to distinguish between prohibitions affecting State elections and prohibitions affecting election of a United States Senator, which have nothing to do with the State law.

Mr. KENYON. May I inquire, does the Senator mean that if Senator STEPHENSON had been a candidate for a State office and the same practices had been carried on in that candidacy for the State office—for instance, a governor—that they would be sufficient to nullify the election?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not referring to practices. I am referring to acts.

Mr. KENYON. Acts, then.

Mr. HEYBURN. An act might be prohibited by the State law—

Mr. KENYON. Let me finish this.

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator claim that acts which may not have been justified under State law can be justified as to an election to the Senate?

Mr. HEYBURN. Because the Wisconsin law says a candidate for office in that State may not do certain things, it does not follow the doing of those things are per se criminal or in violation of any law except the law that declares specifically that they shall not do them.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator claim that the Senate of the United States could not investigate unless the matter had been a violation of the Wisconsin law?

Mr. HEYBURN. My reply is rather an inquiry. Why should the Senate of the United States investigate a question in which it is not interested in determining the issue?

Mr. KENYON. If a general scheme of fraud and corruption—I am not referring to this case, but a suppositive case—existed in the election of a Senator, and forsooth there was not a single statute of a State where he was elected that was violated, would the Senate be limited to inquiring whether the statutes of the State had been violated; in other words, whether a man was guilty of a criminal offense, before he could be excluded from the Senate? Is the only disqualification for the Senate that the man is detained in the jail or penitentiary?

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senate is not limited at all except by the question of propriety. There is no limit upon the Senate's power.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Iowa read the quotation from the opinion of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], and referred to it as the opinion of the majority.

Mr. KENYON. I corrected that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is merely preliminary. The minority view does the same thing. So far as I have listened thus far neither the Senator from Iowa nor the majority in their views have attempted to point out any violation of the statute of Wisconsin, except, as they claim, that the expenditure of money was corrupt.

Of course the Senator and I differ upon the facts. I think there is no evidence in this record which shows, or reasonably tends to show, that any of this money was expended for the purpose of corrupting or bribing either voters or members of the legislature. The Senator differs with me about that. Now, waiving that question, can the Senator tell us of any statute that was violated by the Senator from Wisconsin or by any of his agents prior to his election to the Senate of the United States?

Mr. KENYON. I will say in answer to the Senator's question that, giving only my judgment on the matter, I expect to point out in what respect I believe the statutes of Wisconsin have been violated, not conceding that that is at all necessary to sustain the views of the minority; in other words, I contend that corrupt practices may exist that would vitiate an election even if they did not violate the statutes of Wisconsin.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was passing the question of the expenditure of money being corruptly used to bribe voters. I asked the Senator whether or not there is anything in the record to indicate any violation of any other statute.

Mr. KENYON. I think it a debatable question, and I propose to point out later where, in my judgment, there has been a violation of the Wisconsin statute.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will listen to the Senator with interest.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the junior Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Those who have not had an opportunity to study this case as thoroughly as Senators on the committee feel an interest in knowing whether or not the committee, either the majority or the minority, is of the opinion that it is necessary to show a violation of any law of the State of Wisconsin in order to lodge a case against the validity of a seat when corruption is charged. We have been discussing in this case the question of a technical violation of some law.

I would be interested to know whether or not it is necessary, except in the way of accentuating the proof, to consider that question at all. In other words, if there were no statute in the State of Wisconsin prohibiting any of these things which are claimed by one side to have been done and by the other not to have been done, if there was no law either with reference to bribery or the use of money, would it in anywise embarrass or control this case in the judgment of the committee?

Mr. SUTHERLAND rose.

Mr. KENYON. Is the Senator from Idaho directing his inquiry to me?

Mr. BORAH. I directed it to the Senator from Iowa, if he desires to answer that question, and I would like to hear from the other side, too.

Mr. KENYON. Then the Senator can take his choice. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I do not think it is necessary to show that the Senator from Wisconsin has violated any—

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I want to suggest that this is a matter of some importance and we should be informed about it. If the Senator from Iowa occupies his present place in the Senate whenever he is interrupted, those who are interrupting him necessarily turn their backs to this part of the Chamber, and we can hear nothing whatever of the discussion. I think if the Senator from Iowa would take a more central position during the delivery of his speech it would be very much to the advantage of all.

Mr. KENYON. I am perfectly content that Senators shall turn their backs on me and turn to the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. BACON. The Senator can be heard very well from where he stands while he is speaking, but when he is interrupted Senators interrupting him necessarily turn to him and we can not hear the discussion between the Senator and those who interrupt him.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I do not contend that it would be necessary to show that the Senator from Wisconsin had violated any statute of the State of Wisconsin. If it were shown that he had by the use of money corrupted voters, bribed voters, I would not care whether there was a statute of the State of Wisconsin against it or not. I should vote in a case of that kind that the Senator forfeited his right to his seat. But my inquiry of the Senator from Iowa was directed to his statement that the Senator from Wisconsin had violated some statute, and I carefully limited my inquiry, when I made it, by excluding from it any evidence tending to show corruption or bribery, and asked him whether or not there was a violation of the statute of Wisconsin in any other respect, because it seems to have been taken for granted that the Senator from Wisconsin had violated some specific statute of Wisconsin in addition to having corrupted and bribed voters.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Utah will remember that I suggested it was a debatable proposition, not conceding at all that it is necessary for the purpose of this inquiry that a statute of Wisconsin be violated. Indeed, it would seem to me that it was an error, if I may be pardoned for saying so, of the distinguished Senator from Utah and the distinguished Senator from Ohio in their report, in assuming and arguing that there was no violation of the Wisconsin statute and giving that a prominence and importance which it did not deserve. If there had been a question of debauchery of the electorate of Wisconsin, if every man in Wisconsin had been placed on the pay roll of Senator STEPHENSON, that would have been no violation of the laws of Wisconsin, but certainly the Senate would inquire into that kind of practice as a corrupt practice. So I think the statute only, as the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] suggests, accentuates the situation.

Mr. HEYBURN and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the senior Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I hope my colleague will pardon me if I seem to interrupt him. I think Senators fail to distinguish between a proposition to expel a Senator and the investigation of the validity of an election of a Senator. In the question of his election his personal character cuts no figure whatever. The doing of immoral things or the commission of immoral acts cuts no figure whatever. It is a clear-cut question. Was he elected? And the only inquiry adverse to it is, Did he do things forbidden by law? You must get that question clear in your mind or you will be confused throughout all this question. If a Senator is elected without violating the laws governing the election his election must be conceded. Then the question as to whether or not he is entitled to retain his seat in this body may be raised by proceedings to expel him, and in such proceedings you may go into his individual character; you may inquire as to whether he is a gambler or drinks to excess or does anything that would render him an unfit companion to sit in this body with reputable Senators. I think it is that failure to draw the distinction out of which some of the controversy arises.

Mr. KENYON. Then you can not investigate the election of a Senator unless he has done things that make him a candidate for the jail or the penitentiary. Is that the position of the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; he may violate the laws of the United States whether he was subject to such punishment or not. The law of the United States may say that he shall forfeit his office; it may provide any one of several conceivable penalties. I am discussing this from the standpoint of the law as it exists now, not from the standpoint of the law as it would exist if the Constitution of the United States was amended, because, thank God, it is not amended.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the junior Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Putting aside the question of expulsion, requiring, of course, two-thirds of the Senate, and viewing this matter solely as to the validity of the seat of the Senator from Wisconsin, I understand now the Senator from Utah and my colleague differ as to the proposition of the necessity of proving the violation of some law.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not think we differ.

Mr. BORAH. My inability to distinguish between the two propositions may be the real trouble, but certainly it would not make any difference whether Mr. STEPHENSON had violated any law or not so far as our right to inquire into the validity of his election is concerned. When it is charged that he has used money in a corrupt manner for the purpose of obtaining his seat, it would not make any difference if there was no law upon the statute books of Wisconsin in reference to that subject; and it would not be sufficient, either, if it was contended that he had been legally and formally elected by the legislature, to cut off any investigation of the legislature to find out what fraudulent or corrupt influence worked upon the legislature to bring around that legal formality. The very object and purpose of inquiring into corrupt methods is to pass from under the formality of law and to see whether what was done according to the law and in conformity with it was in reality accomplished by corruption.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will ask the permission of the Senator from Iowa while I make this suggestion.

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Under no law, written or unwritten, was Mr. STEPHENSON a candidate, with responsibilities as a candidate, prior to the meeting of the legislature and its proceedings for the election of a Senator. The term "candidate" has been used as a fiction. It has been used as a substitute for a legitimate word. It has no application.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. KENYON. With pleasure.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, this phase of the question is to me a very important one. I think I have not overlooked the distinction between the grounds that would justify the Senate in expelling one of its Members and all matters that go to the question of title to the office, which, I think, are two distinct and separate things. But in this case the whole question, it seems to me, turns upon one thing, namely, whether the corrupt expenditure of money, for I assume it to be corrupt, in securing votes at a primary election does in fact taint his seat in this body, if by that means he procured votes in the legislature. It is said, of course, that in an election for United States Senator the primary election has no place.

Mr. KENYON. I would like to inquire about how much of my time the Senator proposes to take.

Mr. WORKS. If the Senator objects, I will take none.

Mr. KENYON. I do not like to object, but I propose to discuss that very question. I only want to have a little of my time for my own use.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I have started to make some suggestions arising out of this report, but in answer to the suggestion of the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] I will say there is no misconception in my mind, although I may state it rather crudely, as to the difference in the proposition of the expulsion of a Senator, and the fact that he is not legally elected. A man might be here who was an unfit man to associate with, as the Senator has suggested, and he could be expelled. I imagine if a man had leprosy or something of that character, or on, perhaps, general moral grounds, he could be expelled, although his election had been absolutely legal. He could be here as one of the best men in the world, with nothing against him at all, although his election had been invalid. He could be here under circumstances where he had been instrumental in corrupt practices that would warrant his expulsion, and at the same time those corrupt practices could have entered into the election and vitiated the election.

Some of the minority have been perplexed as to whether or not the fact that Senator STEPHENSON had turned loose this enormous sum of money that shocks public conscience, and I think shocks the conscience of most men, in itself was not sufficient to justify a resolution of expulsion. I have thought in studying this record that the testimony goes further than that—and I know on that I differ from the distinguished Senators of the majority, and I dislike to differ from them—went to the extent of corrupting in a polite, perhaps, and modern style the election itself. Of course, to say that, I must add that under my contention the primary is an instrumentality of the election.

In the report as submitted by the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], this language is used, which might be considered likewise unkind:

The account which was filed of the expenses incurred in connection with the primary did not comply with the law in that it lumped the expenses; gave the names of but very few of the persons to whom money was paid; did not give the dates when expended, nor as fully as contemplated by the statutes the purposes for which expended. The account as filed was approved by the general counsel of Mr. STEPHENSON without any examination of the statute, and simply because it conformed with certain accounts, which had been filed by prominent candidates for other offices. A careful examination of this account justifies the belief that it was purposely drawn so as to give to the public as little information as possible.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator read what follows, because it qualifies it?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

The penalty for failing to comply with this statute is a fine only, and it does not provide for the forfeiture of the office. If it did, the statute to that extent would be unconstitutional, but Mr. STEPHENSON, because of his failure to file a proper account, has violated the statute and is subject to a fine. However, he must be absolved from any moral delinquency, because in the preparation and filing of his account he consulted with counsel, and followed their advice, and if it was not properly done they were to blame rather than he.

Is that as far as the Senator desires me to read?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is all.

Mr. KENYON. The language of the distinguished Senator from Idaho I do not thoroughly understand, but it seems to me that the language in his clear-cut way of putting things is an indictment of this entire election and might be considered likewise unkind.

The amount of money expended by Mr. STEPHENSON, Mr. Cook, Mr. Hatton, and Mr. McGovern in the primary campaign was so extravagant and the expenditures made by and on behalf of these gentlemen were made with such reckless disregard of propriety as to justify the sharpest criticism. Such expenditures were in violation of the fundamental principles underlying our system of government, which contemplated the selection of candidates by the electors and not the selection of the electors by the candidate.

I have not been able, as one of the minority, to understand how the Senate could be asked to place its mark of approval upon practices and methods involving expenditures which were in violation of "the fundamental principles underlying our system of government."

Mr. HEYBURN. But, Mr. President, I state what fundamental principle it is. I do not believe it is a general statement. It is that one fundamental principle to which I refer.

Mr. KENYON. That is, the expenditure in "the selection of electors." I suppose there is an explanation for it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I notice other Senators seem to have overlooked it.

Mr. KENYON. I am perhaps more dense.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; it is not an occasion on which the Senator can charge himself with being dense. I should like to just straighten that out now. It will take but a moment to do it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. To what page of the report does the Senator from Iowa refer?

Mr. KENYON. To page 30 of the report.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. While the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] is looking for a reference, will the Senator from Iowa permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. KENYON. Gladly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The statement here is:

Such expenditures were in violation of the fundamental principles underlying our system of government—

And so on. The Senator, I take it, would be willing to concede that certain things might be in violation of the fundamental principles of our system of government, and yet not such as to involve a moral offense or the doing of a wicked thing. For example—though the Senator and I differ about it—I think the initiative, the referendum, and the recall are in absolute violation of the fundamental principles of this Government, and yet it is not a wicked thing to put them into operation.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Utah undoubtedly thinks it is a wicked thing.

Mr. HEYBURN. I now have the reference for which I was looking:

Such expenditures—

This is a final and complete statement, new and different from anything that has preceded it—

Mr. KENYON. From what pages does the Senator read?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am reading from the second paragraph on page 24 of the large volume:

Such expenditures were in violation of the fundamental principles underlying our system of government, which contemplated the selection of candidates by the electors and not the selection of the electors by the candidate.

It was intended in a form to restate the old principle of objection against the man seeking the office rather than the office—which is the people themselves—seeking the man. That is all there is of that. It is not a statement that goes beyond that.

Mr. KENYON. It is rather a startling method of stating the objection which the Senator had in mind.

Mr. HEYBURN. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. KENYON. I say it is rather a startling way of stating the objection and the proposition that the Senator had in mind, but possibly a forcible way of stating it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the language fits the sentiment.

Mr. KENYON. I think it expresses the Senator's view. I want, however, to pass to the legal question that has been suggested by the Senator from California.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. KERN. I observe that in that denunciation the conduct of Mr. McGovern is condemned with equal severity as that of Senator STEPHENSON. I should like to inquire what amount of money Mr. McGovern is said to have expended in that election.

Mr. KENYON. That appears in the report.

Mr. KERN. As I remember, it was something like $12,000.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, it was eleven thousand and eighty-odd dollars, as I remember.

Mr. KENYON. Does that answer the question of the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. KERN. It does.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the legal questions which have been suggested by the distinguished Senators from Idaho and California are interesting to any lawyer, are very serious, and very important in this case. The Senator from Idaho raises a question as to our power to inquire into a primary and to declare void an election by a legislature where the real offense is in the primary. If we confine this discussion to actions within the legislature itself, under the clause of the Constitution that Senators shall be chosen by the legislatures of the several States, I can not, in a fair judgment on this record, make up my mind beyond any question that there was any such corruption in the legislature itself, dissociated from any primary, as would warrant the unseating of Mr. STEPHENSON or the nullification of his election. There are suspicious circumstances. At that election the three Democrats remaining away is a very suspicious circumstance, although there is no testimony in the record to show that they were in any way corrupted. Then there is the evidence as to Mr. Wellensgard, Mr. Bancroft, and Mr. Reynolds, who had received money either when they intended to be candidates or after they were candidates for the legislature, and in the case of Wellensgard, I think, he received money after the time he was elected. I am in this discussion inclined to agree with the distinguished Senator from Idaho that the election occurred in January. I do not believe that any presiding officer, where both houses had voted, could set aside that election and thus delay an election; but I have not thought that consideration important on the theory of the case which presents itself to my mind and which I am trying to present to the Senate.

Messrs. Wellensgard, Reynolds, and Bancroft had in their pockets the money of the candidate for Senator. I realize that the term "candidate for Senator" may not be constitutionally correct, but I use it with reference to the circumstances in this case.

If it is not a corrupt practice for the members of the legislature and for men who are candidates for the legislature who are to vote for a Senator to accept the candidate's money, even though they say they use it for him and not for themselves, then there is not anything so far as the proceedings before the legislature itself are concerned to show corruption. I myself think it is a contemptible practice and that it ought to be considered a corrupt practice, sufficient to nullify an election. That view, it seems to me, applies as to these three gentlemen, I do not care if one of them was afterwards elected speaker of the Assembly of Wisconsin. You might just as well, in trying a lawsuit, employ members of the jury to go out and do some work for you. It might be said that that does not affect the jurymen, he is not to work on anything connected with the case on trial; he, however, has the litigant's money in his pocket, but is doing something else. How long would a verdict returned under those circumstances stand? Here were three members of this jury, the jury that passed on Senator STEPHENSON's election, who had been at work, as they said, for him, but, as the evidence clearly shows, both for him and for themselves with his money in their pockets. How long should a verdict of that kind stand when it comes to the court of final review—the Senate of the United States? I do not, however, base my argument on that, but on the corruption in the primary.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. WORKS. If the Senator will pardon me for another interruption, it is just on that point that I hope he will make himself clear. The question in my mind is whether it is sufficient to prove corruption at the primary election or whether you must go further and prove that corruption extended to the election in the legislature, which was the legal election?

Mr. KENYON. That is just what I am coming to. Some questions suggest themselves. Is the power of the Federal Government over primary elections coequal with the power of the Federal Government over general elections? Clearly not. Each House of Congress can determine whether one of its Members has been legally elected, but where is the power to determine whether a Member of Congress or even a member of the legislature has been fairly nominated?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to call the attention of the Senator to the figures. He concedes that Senator STEPHENSON was really elected on January 27?

Mr. POMERENE. January 26.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, January 26 and 27.

Mr. KENYON. I gave that as my judgment as to the time when he was elected.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, Senator STEPHENSON had 5 majority in the senate and 24 in the house, so that 3 votes would not affect the result.

Mr. KENYON. That raises another question—whether there must be a sufficient number of votes affected to overcome the majority or whether it is sufficient to show such a general scheme of fraud and corruption as to vitiate the election; but I appreciate there is force in the Senator's suggestion from his viewpoint. The question is, Were there corrupt practices in the election? That is the constitutional question—not corrupt practices in the primary. I like to state a case as strongly against myself as I can and see if I can answer it. May there not be corruption at the primary and no corruption at the election? Is it possible for an innocent person to cast a corrupted vote? Does the primary relate only to the question of a party nomination, and what power is there under the Constitution to regulate in any way the times, places, or manner of party nominations? What member of the legislature was induced by corruption to vote for STEPHENSON? Of what binding force is the primary? What did STEPHENSON gain by the primary? He could not insist that the primary had settled the election; he could not go to the legislature and say, "I have carried the primary; you must elect me Senator." What did it amount to as to STEPHENSON?

Can a corrupt influence acting on voters, expressing preference at a primary, in any way be connected with votes cast in the legislature? The Constitution knows nothing about a primary. It does not recognize a primary. It has nothing to do with a primary. Then how can the Senate take into consideration what occurs in a primary in unseating a Senator or in declaring an election invalid? I think these observations state the difficulties from a legal standpoint of the primary question.

I realize that these are difficult propositions. My answer is this: We are not attempting to regulate a primary. We are doing nothing with the primary as a primary. The primary is one of the methods employed in the election, just as a caucus is one of the methods employed in an election. It is as closely connected as cause and effect. The primary may be said to be the real election, and I think that language was used, or practically that, by a distinguished Senator in the debate on the publicity bill. We simply inquire not into the primary as anything that is recognized by the Constitution but merely as an instrumentality of the election, and we simply inquire into the methods that have been employed in the primary, the primary in itself being one of the methods employed in the election.

We have no right to say what shall be done at the primary. Nothing in reference to registration, nothing as to the length of hours the polls shall be open, nothing in relation to the ballot—some such rights we might have at an election. While we can not regulate what is done at the primaries, we have a right to say that if certain things are done at the primaries, they are corrupt practices, and void the election if they enter into and influence and control it.

We merely inquire, Has the primary been one of the corrupt means to bring about an election? Senator STEPHENSON accepted the primary as one of the means and methods entering into his election. He spent the great amount of his money not in the legislature but in the primary. If he did not recognize that as one of the methods entering into his election, why did he spend all that money at the primaries? It was virtually the election under the practices of the State of Wisconsin. It was accepted by all these candidates as binding in honor upon them. It was accepted by members of the legislature as binding upon them, and having accepted it as he did, Senator STEPHENSON can not now be heard to say that the primary had nothing whatever to do with the election.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator would not contend that the candidates could meet and agree upon a fictitious code by which they would be governed, and then hold that was a substitute for the law? The act of Congress does not refer to an election by the electorate, but only to an election by the legislature. So it seems to me that meets the suggestion of the Senator that this was an election and should be given the status of an election. If Senator STEPHENSON was ignorant of the law, or if any other candidate was, and proceeded on the assumption that the law was as it was not, it could not affect the result.

Mr. KENYON. I agree with you in that; but if five men were candidates in a senatorial contest, they being the only men who had become candidates, and if one of those men paid the others a sum of money to withdraw and leave the field entirely to him, would it not be a corrupt practice and still have nothing to do with the election? It would be a corrupt method which would enter into and influence the election.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is a question which does not arise in this case. I do not think the Senator from Iowa claims it does.

Mr. KENYON. It is analogous.

Mr. HEYBURN. It confuses the argument to bring in an extraneous legal proposition and by arriving at a conclusion upon it make that conclusion the basis of another one. I do not care to indulge in that.

Mr. KENYON. The primary merely takes the place of the people who would be corrupted; the people there were corrupted, the primary here corrupted.

Mr. HEYBURN. But the primary and the people are entirely outside of the pale of the Constitution.

Mr. KENYON. But it is as stated by Senator Hoar in the Payne case. If B, C, and D have promised to vote as A shall vote, if A be corrupted, 4 votes are gained by the process, though B, C, and D are innocent.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator would not carry it so far as it was attempted in this case. It was undertaken to show that a certain member of the legislature was paid to retain his seat; that is, to be in at the session; and that that was a corrupt act. It was the hiring of a man to do something that affected the result, but it was only hiring him to do his duty. It was his duty to be in his seat.

Mr. KENYON. I suppose it is a man's duty to vote.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. But if he is employed to vote for a certain man would it not be corrupt?

Mr. HEYBURN. That would not be corrupt, because it is his duty to vote.

Mr. KENYON. I can not agree with the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. Oh, I do not mean to vote for a certain man, but I mean to perform the function of his office—to vote. That would not be corrupt.

Mr. KENYON. Take the case of a caucus. A caucus is not recognized in any way under the Constitution. Suppose a caucus is corrupted. It is just a shade nearer the election than the primary. I do not think anyone would seriously contend that if a man secured the nomination of his party in caucus by corrupt methods the Senate could not investigate it; there are precedents to substantiate that. I have thought that even a State convention, where a State adopted the practice of nominating or designating, if you please, a Senator at a State convention, and that was accepted by the candidates, and that was the custom of the party and understood by the people and these men were in honor bound to abide by the action of the convention, and a man was designated as Senator at that convention, and the members of the legislature, in honor bound to abide by the decision of the convention, voted for this man, and then it developed that the convention had been corrupted, we could reach over and investigate that convention, not because it is a part of the election of a Senator, but simply because it is one of the methods employed. I do not go to the extent of a "straw vote," as the Senator from Idaho suggested.

Now, we have other authority in the report of the distinguished Senators from Utah and Ohio, who evidently differ with the distinguished Senator from Idaho.

They say, on page 28:

We have no hesitancy in saying that if the evidence disclosed the use of corrupt methods at the primaries, it would affect the result of the election by the general assembly, and the Senate would be justified in taking cognizance of that fact and unseating any Senator who was thus delinquent.

I realize that lawyers differ on this proposition, but it is a very dangerous precedent to say that a primary established by law within a State, recognized by candidates, can be debauched and corrupted, and yet the Senate can not investigate it or can not unseat a Senator because of corruption in the primary. If there is no precedent on that proposition, because primaries are new institutions, it is time to make a precedent. But I contend that there are.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. If there was corruption, it commenced in the legislature which enacted a statute in violation of the Corstitution of the United States. That is where it commenced. The legislature that undertook to say that a Senator of the United States should be elected in some other way than that provided for by the Constitution of the United States performed an act either of ignorance or of corruption—one or the other.

Mr. KENYON. I suppose the Senator could go still further—

Mr. HEYBURN. And carry that right down the line.

Mr. KENYON. I suppose, then, on the Senator's theory the people who voted for that kind of a legislature were corrupt.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not on the side that is seeking to regulate the Legislature of Wisconsin. I was merely giving a reason. In other words, I was carrying out the analogy. The Senator said that to violate the law was a corrupt act—a law that had been passed without authority; that to violate it was a corrupt act. The way to treat a law enacted without authority is to disregard it. The man makes a mistake when he undertakes to comply with it. Senator STEPHENSON made a mistake. I hold no brief for Senator STEPHENSON, although I saw a newspaper statement last night that I was representing him on the floor. I am not. I am not representing him or anyone else. But of course he made a mistake when he undertook to comply with a void law—absolutely void; not only void, but a vicious law. He undertook to comply with it because he did not know or realize that it was a void or vicious law, I assume. Whether he succeeded in complying with it or failed is a matter of no consequence whatever.

Mr. NELSON. I ask the Senator from Idaho if the people violate the Constitution in establishing the primary system, can such a violation be reached by this new doctrine of the judicial recall?

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator from Iowa will pardon me, it might be reached by submitting the decision of the Supreme Court to the fourth ward for rejection or approval, or it might be reached by suspending the statutes of Congress by a proclamation, or by several vicious examples that we have known in recent years.

Mr. KENYON. What ward is it that the Senator referred to?

Mr. HEYBURN. The fourth. The fourth is just as good to illustrate the point as any other. It would be submitted to the wards.

Mr. KENYON. A national convention is unknown to the Constitution. If a national convention was a corrupted institution, I suppose that question could never be raised in any way?

Mr. HEYBURN. I think no one will contend that the proceedings of a national convention could be made the subject or the ground for impeaching a President or Vice President who was elected pursuant to its action. I think no one will contend for that. That would result in anarchy.

Mr. KENYON. I do not desire to claim that it could.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand the Senator from Idaho to say that the law providing for a primary in a State is an act of corruption and a violation of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator from Mississippi did not hear me correctly. I said a law providing a primary election to dispense with the provisions of section 4 Article I.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand. In other words, a law providing a primary election in a State as a means of determining the candidate of a party for the office of senator in a State—

Mr. HEYBURN. No; not a senator in a State—a Senator of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Either one. Call it whatever you please—a Senator from the State to the Congress of the United States or in the Congress is a violation of the Constitution of the United States and an act of corruption.

Now, then, the Constitution of the United States says as distinctly in connection with a President that he shall be elected by the electoral college as it says in connection with a Senator that he shall be elected by the State legislature. Therefore, if the logic of the Senator be good, then a national convention to nominate a President of the United States is a violation of the Constitution of the United States and is an act of corruption. Why? Because the one is an instrumentality resorted to for the purpose of ascertaining the will of the people in order that the instrumentality designated by law as the elective machinery may be guided, and so is the other.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator would not contend that the convention controlled the action of the electoral college. The electoral college is free to elect a President of the United States, and all that the national convention does is to express a preference and adopt a platform and leave it to the honor and the free will of the electoral college.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes. All that a national convention does is to put an elector belonging to the party which that national convention represents in a position where he is bound in honor to carry out the instructions of the convention; and all that a primary to designate a candidate of the party for Senator does is to put the members of the legislature belonging to that party in a position where as a matter of honor they are compelled to carry out those instructions. An elector may violate his instructions. A legislator may violate his instructions. One is as free as the other. But the question of honor is there.

Mr. HEYBURN. Would it affect the validity of the title to the office?

Mr. KENYON. I should like to have a little part of my own time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If it be proven that a vote of a legislator in a legislature was due to the fact that he was instructed in the primary, and then it was proven that the primary was corrupt, why does it not affect the election itself?

Mr. KENYON. I agree with the Senator from Mississippi.

I want to read as bearing on this very question a short portion from one of the minority reports in the Payne case, signed by Senators Teller, Everts, and Logan. I read from page 711 of Senate Election Cases, volume 3:

We have in our conclusions made no distinction between the use of fraud, corruption, or bribery in a caucus vote or in the legislative vote for a Senator. Although a caucus or what proceeds in it has no constitutional or legal relation to the election of a Senator, yet by the habit of political parties, the stage of determination as to who is to be elected Senator, and the influences, proper or improper, that produce that determination is that which precedes and is concluded in the caucus. So far as the question of personal delinquency or turpitude is concerned, no moral distinction should be taken between corrupt proceedings in caucus and those in the legislature. How far any such distinction would need to be insisted upon in any case on the question of unseating a Senator where he himself was not affected with any personal misconduct or complicity with the misconduct of others, we have no occasion in the immediate case or attitude of the subject to consider or suggest.

I now read from page 715 of Senate Election Cases, volume 3, from the report in the Payne case, signed by Senators George F. Hoar and William P. Frye:

What is the effect upon an election of Senator of bribery of voters in a caucus of the legislators who are to make the choice is a question upon which we prefer not to form an opinion until the evidence is before us. The members of a caucus ordinarily deem themselves bound in honor to vote in the election for the person whom it nominates by the vote of a majority on condition that such person belonged to their party and is fit for the office in point of character and ability. Bribery, therefore, which changes the result in the caucus, would ordinarily determine the election.

If B, C, and D have promised to vote as A shall vote, if A be corrupted 4 votes are gained by the process, although B, C, and D be innocent. In looking, therefore, to see whether an election by the legislature was procured or effected by bribery, it may be very important to discover whether that bribery procured the nomination of a caucus whose action a majority of the legislature were bound in honor to support.

I read further the words of Senator Hoar and Senator Frye in their minority report, page 717:

It will hardly be doubted that cases of purchase of seats in the Senate will multiply rapidly under the decision proposed by the majority of the committee. The first great precedent to constitute the rule under this branch of law is to be this:

"Held, by the Senate of the United States, that a charge made by the legislature of a State, and by the committee of the political party to which the larger number of its citizens belong, and by 10 of its Representatives in Congress, that an election of Senator was procured by bribery, accompanied by the offer to prove the fact, does not deserve the attention of the Senate."

In the Caldwell case, which seems to me to be directly in point, Mr. Caldwell had agreed to pay to Mr. Carney $15,000, Carney to withdraw as a candidate and throw his influence to Mr. Caldwell. Carney was in the place of the primary as to the influence exerted. There was the corrupting influence. In the report of the majority in that case, which is found beginning on page 429 of Senate Election Cases, 1789-1903, after setting forth this infamous bargain, it is said at page 430:

The first question to be considered is: Was this arrangement corrupt? Was it the use of corrupt means on the part of Mr. Caldwell to procure his election? The committee are of opinion that it was corrupt; was against public policy; was demoralizing in its character; directly contributed to destroy the purity and freedom of election, and not to be tolerated by the Senate of the United States as a means of procuring a seat in that body.

Looking at the transaction in its real character, it was a sale upon the part of Mr. Carney of the votes of his personal and political friends in the legislature, to be delivered by him to Mr. Caldwell as far as possible. If it were legitimate for Mr. Caldwell to buy off Mr. Carney as a candidate, it was equally legitimate to buy off all the other candidates and have the field to himself, by which he would exert a quasi-coercion upon the members of the legislature to vote for him, having no other candidate to vote for. It was an attempt to buy the votes of members of the legislature, not by bribing them directly, but through the manipulations of another.

And if corrupt practices existed in a primary it would be securing the votes of the legislature by the manipulation of the primary.

The purchase money was not to go to them, but to Mr. Carney, who was to sell and deliver them without their knowledge.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator I think there—

Mr. KENYON. In just a moment. Please let me finish the reading—

Buying off opposing candidates, and in that way securing the votes of all or the most of their friends is, in effect, buying the office. It recognizes candidacy for office as a merchantable commodity, a thing having a money value, and is as destructive to the purity and freedom of elections as the direct bribery of members of the legislature.

A candidate for the Senate without strength or merit may, by purchasing the influence and support of all or a part of his competitors and withdrawing them from the canvass, succeed in an election, thus not only committing a fraud upon the friends of the candidates who were purchased off, but a greater fraud upon the people of the State, who may be thus saddled with a representative in the Senate of the United States about whom they know little, for whom they care nothing, and who possesses little ability to represent their interests.

That was the language in the Caldwell case.

Mr. HEYBURN. I only want—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KENYON. I yield for a question, but not for an argument.

Mr. HEYBURN. I only want to call attention to a danger in the record. The Senator interpolated his comments on a primary.

Mr. KENYON. I will arrange that.

Mr. HEYBURN. That will need some correction.

Mr. KENYON. I think that is true.

In the debate on the Caldwell case, the Senator from Vermont, Mr. Morrill, expressed his surprise at the enormous sum of money, $15,000, as he said the largest amount of alleged corruption of that kind in the history of senatorial elections, while we are here presented with seven times that amount. The great Senator from Indiana, Mr. Morton, said:

It is in the broadest sense "undue influence" over suffrage, exerted for a "lucrative consideration," and none the less so because the persons upon whom exerted were ignorant of the character of the transaction. It is bribery in the wholesale rather than retail.

And again he said:

For example, suppose a man secretly procured an opposing candidate to be poisoned and thus secure his election, and afterwards the crime becomes known; or suppose he secretly procure his opponent to be kidnapped, and the sudden disappearance being unaccounted for he thus obtains the election; or suppose he procure his opponent to be arrested upon false charges of crime, and thus obtain his election; or suppose he procure his election by the most monstrous frauds, by intimidation, by gross bribery, by buying off the opposing candidates, or by other dishonorable and illegal means, and slip into the Senate before his offense is discovered, shall it be said that the success of his crimes and their successful concealment for the time shall become their constitutional protection, and that he may hold onto the seat which he has thus illegally and fraudulently obtained?

I want to pass from that proposition, because anxious to finish what I have to say to-night, and I will hurry along. I think these precedents establish sufficiently the proposition that corruption at a primary, if it enters into and affects the election by exerting an undue influence on the members of the legislature who are in honor bound, is a subject for investigation, and that corruption at the primary can vitiate an election.

The second proposition I want to lay down is that if the corruption or corrupt practice existed in the primary to such an extent as to taint and vitiate it, and members of the legislature held themselves in honor bound by the primary, not knowing of corruption, was the primary not then a corrupt influence in itself, and did not this corrupt or, rather, corrupted influence sway the judgment of members of the legislature and bring about the election thereby?

The third proposition is one also of difficulty, and that is the one that has been suggested here many times to-day. I maintain it to be the law, as far as this investigation is concerned, or, at least, as far as this case is concerned, that acts at the primary may not constitute a technical violation of the Wisconsin statute, yet that may be sufficient to constitute corrupt practices. I do not in this concede for one moment that they are not in violation of the Wisconsin statute. I wish I had more time to go into the suggestion of the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. I want to refer to simply one section. It is section 4478, paragraph 3. I will not read it, but will be glad to insert it in my remarks, if there is no objection:

3. Every person who shall, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, make any such gift, loan, offer, promise, procurement, or agreement as aforesaid to or for any person in order to induce such person to procure or endeavor to procure the election of any person to a public office or the vote of any voter at any election.

The giving of something of value to a newspaper or the giving of something of value to voters, bringing them in, as they were brought in from the quarry, to influence and secure votes, is very close to a violation of the Wisconsin bribery statute. I am not going to enlarge upon that now, because I have not time.

It is a debatable question. I believe when the editor of a newspaper who is opposed to a man, writing articles about him depreciating his ability and his character, receives a large sum for advertising, and immediately sways the influence of his paper and endeavors to influence voters in favor of the man he has been opposing before he receives this thing of value, that we have a question for a jury under proper instruction of the court. I do not believe he could be convicted, but do believe the technical offense would be there.

But the term "corrupt practice" is one of large import. It is not limited to technical violations of a statute. We draw a good deal of illumination from the decisions under the English corrupt-practices act and decisions under the Canadian acts and in the Provinces of Canada. I have not time to go into those fully. Of course most of them are under statutes and acts of Parliament or the legislative assemblies of Canadian Provinces, but there is language in them as to the effect of corrupt practices carried to such an extent as to constitute bribery practically under the common law that illuminates the general subject.

For instance, in the case of Sisson's petition v. Ardagh respondent (Dominion of Canada), found in Hodgins' Election Cases, page 50, it was held: That the hiring by an agent of the respondent of a railway train to convey voters to and from places along the line of railway where they could vote was a payment of the traveling expenses of voters in going to and from an election within the meaning of section 71 of 32 Victoria, chapter 21, and was a corrupt practice and avoided the election.

This is based on the theory of corrupt practices under the statute.

There was a case of employing a railroad train to bring voters to the polls. It was held to be a corrupt practice and to vitiate the election.

Again in the election for North Middlesex, in the case of Cameron v. McDougall, found in Hodgins' Election Cases, 376, it was held—

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator from Iowa please inform us whether in the instance referred to, where it was held that the employment of a train to haul voters to the polls was a violation of some section of the British statute—

Mr. KENYON. Yes; of the Canadian statutes, or rather of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario.

Mr. POMERENE. In other words, there was a specific statute making that an offense.

Mr. KENYON. I intended to say that. I did so state, I think.

Mr. POMERENE. I did not so understand the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. I am only gathering light from the language of the court in a number of these cases.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me an inquiry?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly. I am very anxious to get through, that is all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator think that would be a corrupt practice such as would invalidate a seat in this body if done by a candidate for the United States Senate?

Mr. KENYON. I make this distinction: There are certain customs, of course, that have grown up and are regarded as proper. I do not think myself that bringing voters to the polls is a proper proceeding, but I do think that if you would pursue that to excess, so that you are paying for bringing a substantial number of voters to the polls, it is a corrupt practice the same as excessive treating might be.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator knows it is the practice in practically every State of the Union for each party on the day of election to hire carriages and automobiles to bring voters to the polls by wholesale.

Mr. KENYON. I think it is wrong.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I agree with the Senator; I think it is thoroughly improper; but is it a corrupt thing to do?

Mr. KENYON. I do not think it is corrupt unless it is carried to an extraordinary degree. Take a county election. If at such an election you haul men in by the hundreds who did not intend to vote, I would think it might be a corrupt practice, but I recognize—

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator inform us where he would draw the dividing line between what would be a corrupt practice and what would not be in that transaction?

Mr. KENYON. Oh, just as you would draw a dividing line between what is reasonable care and what is not reasonable care. It depends upon the particular circumstances and conditions surrounding the transaction. It must go to such extent as to amount to undue influence.

Mr. POMERENE. Can the Senator refer us to any precedent?

Mr. KENYON. If the Senator will just give me time I will try to reach some.

Mr. POMERENE. I would be very glad to hear them.

Mr. KENYON. I did not mean to be discourteous at all.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, I did not so understand it.

Mr. KENYON. In a case arising out of the election for North Middlesex, Cameron, petitioner, v. MacDougall, respondent (Hodgins Cases, 376), it was held that treating was not per se a corrupt act except when made so by statute, but the intent of the party treating may make it so, and the intent must be judged by all the circumstances by which it is attended. When it is done by a candidate in order to make for himself a reputation for good fellowship and hospitality, and thereby to influence electors to vote for him, it is a species of bribery which would void his election at the common law, and the court says (p. 386):

It seems to all come to this: Treating is not per se a corrupt act. The intent of the act must be judged by all of the circumstances by which it is attended. If in this case the evidence led me to the conclusion that the respondent did what he did in order to make for himself a reputation for good fellowship and hospitality, and thereby to influence electors to vote for him, I should incline to think it a species of bribery which would void the election at common law. But upon a careful consideration of the evidence it does not lead me to that conclusion.

In the North Victoria case, before election court, Cameron, petitioner, v. McLennan, Hodgkin's Election Cases, 584, this significant language is used by the court (pp. 599-600P):

As to the objection to the charge of treating and undue influence alleged in the third paragraph of the petition in connection with bribery, if the treating were to such an extent as to amount to bribery and the undue influence was of a character to affect the whole election, without referring to any statutory provisions, it would, by the law of Parliament, I apprehend, influence the result. The first principle of parliamentary law as applicable to elections is that they must be free, and if treating and undue influence were carried to an extent to render the election not free, then the election would be void.

The following observations apply generally to votes that may be influenced by treating:

To vote influenced by treating is bad before the statute, and it is bad now.

It would seem necessary to say not only that the entertainment was corruptly received by the voter, but that it was corruptly given by the candidate; but as proof of the former would invalidate the vote at common law, it is unnecessary to add proof of the latter.

In the somewhat famous Long case, which is cited by Lord Coke in his Institutes, one Thomas Long gave the mayor of Westbury £4 to be elected Burgess. He was elected. The case was examined by the House of Commons; the mayor was fined, Long removed, and Lord Coke (and this is the significant language upon which I predicate my judgment in this case), referring to it, said: "For this corrupt dealing was to poison the very fountain itself." That was 100 years before the statutes of Parliament fixed the very heavy penalties for bribery. The fountain itself when poisoned ends the election. The fountain may be poisoned even if no statutes are violated.

Under the light of these authorities, regardless of statutory enactment, the following would, in my judgment, constitute corrupt practices. I do not claim that the authorities cited are binding as precedents, because they are under acts of the British Parliament or of the Canadian Legislative Assembly; the reasoning therein is helpful in arriving at what is corruption in elections:

Excessive payment for work done at the polls.

Excessive payment for bringing men to polls.

Excessive number of men at the polls, as this quarry situation, when they were brought to the polls from the quarries in large number to work. That is the most common way of buying votes.

Excessive treating to influence voters. If a man debauched an entire county or treated an entire State and put the men in a county on a prolonged drunk to influence them while they were in that condition, there would be no statute of Wisconsin or any other State against this; but it would prevent the free and untrammelled exercise of the right of suffrage, and if it was carried to that extent it would be a corrupt practice, statute or no statute.

Excessive payment for advertising to get the support of newspapers.

Payment to State officers to secure their influence.

Payment to candidates for the legislature.

In this primary, assuming that the primary is part of an election, an instrumentality of the election, those things were the corrupt practices, regardless of the statute, and were enough under this evidence to vitiate the election.

Freedom of election is, at common law, essential to the validity of an election.

If this freedom be by any means prevented generally, the election is void at common law. An election is therefore avoided by general bribery, although not brought home to the candidate or his agents. (Rogers on Elections, Vol. II, p. 293.)

But an election will not be avoided upon this ground unless the bribery is shown to have been so extensive that there could not have been a free election.

General corruption at common law avoids an election, regardless of question of agency.

The giving of entertainment to voters without corrupt motive was probably not an offense at common law.

However, when it reaches the point of debauching an entire electorate it certainly becomes a corrupt practice.

But if entertainment for purpose of influencing the election, it comes within the scope of the common law as a species of bribery.

Unduly influencing a voter by improper means is a corrupt practice. There is abundant authority, in my judgment, to sustain these propositions.

There are a number of authorities on this question of bribery and corruption amounting to bribery that might be read with interest.

I refer to the following extracts. Cushing, in his work on the Law of Legislative Assemblies, says:

The great principle which lies at the foundation of all elective governments and an essential, indeed, to the very idea of election is that the electors shall be free in the giving of their suffrages. The principle was declared by the English Parliament in the Declaration of Rights. The same principle is asserted or implied in the constitutions of all the States of the Union.

Freedom of election is violated by external violence, by which the electors are constrained, or by bribery, by which their will is corrupted; and in all cases where the electors are prevented in either of these ways from the free exercise of their rights the election will be void, without reference to the number of votes thereby affected.

Shepard on Elections (p. 97):

Besides the practice of purchasing individual votes, there sprang up a corruption far more extensive, in which the commanding influence in a borough was transferred, either by a sum of money paid down at once, or, with a more accurate calculation of traffic, for an annual payment during the continuance of Parliament; the sitting member thus purchasing the return of him who had previously purchased the power of returning. To repress this practice the 49 George III, chapter 118, was passed, by which it was made highly penal to enter into any pecuniary engagement for procuring the return of a member of Parliament.

Shepard, in his treatise, says:

The bribery act makes no mention of any parliamentary disqualification affecting a member's seat; the effect, therefore, of an act of bribery not within the words of the treating act of 7 William III, chapter 4, is in that respect determined by the law of Parliament as follows: Bribery by a candidate, though in one instance only, and though a majority of the unbribed votes remain in his favor, will avoid the particular election.

Said the Court of King's Bench in Rex v. Pitt, Burroughs, 1338:

Bribery at elections of members of Parliament must always have been a crime at common law and punishable by indictment and information.

Rogers, in the treatise referred to, says:

Bribery, as we have seen, had always been a misdemeanor at common law and a violation of the privilege of Parliament; but the above statute (the bribery act) armed courts of law with new and extraordinary powers to attack the growing evil by attaching a penalty of £500 on every conviction of an offense against its provisions, and by disqualifying the offender from ever again voting at any election for members of Parliament.

Shepard, in his treatise on elections, speaking of bribery, says:

Though it was always an offense at common law, it is thought that no prosecution for this species of bribery took place until the bribery act, for which the jealousy of the Commons in regard to their privileges sufficiently accounts. As soon, however, as the Commons began to rise in importance and a seat was considered of sufficient political value to be purchased, they were not slow to discover and attempt themselves to repress the pernicious consequences of such corruption.

In the same discussion of the Caldwell case heretofore referred to, Senator Morton said:

The principles of the common law are applicable in all civil matters touching the validity of elections or the tenure of office, and it is a well-established principle of the common law that whatever impairs the "freedom of elections" is illegal and against public policy and will make the election void.

Further on the same Senator said:

But the absence of a statute punishing these several practices impairing the freedom of elections in no wise affects the operation of the general principle touching the validity of elections.

Now, Mr. President, we are confronted with the evidence in the first place—I am not going to spend much time on this evidence—of the expenditure of $107,000. Of course the presumption of innocence, the presumption of honesty, follows in this election. The presumption of innocence is evidence; it is put in the scale of evidence. It is not a conclusive presumption.

Reasonable doubt is the result of proof or of failure of proof, but a presumption is evidence, and there is a presumption of innocence. What is put against that presumption? The unexplained, assuming it to be unexplained, expenditure of this great sum of money that shocks public conscience. When that evidence is introduced as against this presumption, it makes a prima facie case. I do not think the burden of proof, probably, ever shifts, but we use the term as shifting. The burden then comes of explaining this enormous expenditure. I want to just call attention briefly to a few words in the case of Sisson's petition against Ardagh, named in Hodgkin's Election Cases, page 58, heretofore referred to as bearing on this question:

Next it is said that Mr. Lauder entrusted large sums to Perry, that he should have supervised the expenditure, and that his failure to do so makes him personally a party, within section 46 of the act of 1871 (34 Vic., ch. 3), to every illegal application of money by Perry or by those who received money from Perry. The sum which Mr. Lauder gave was under $700; there is no evidence before me that that sum was an excessive one for legitimate expenses, and a certain amount of discretion must be placed in a candidate's agents. If he had put $7,000 into Perry's hands the argument of a corrupt purpose might have been reasonable. The facts do not suggest to my mind any idea that Mr. Lauder intended his money to be employed illegally.

The distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], with that clearness of legal expression which is my constant envy, said in the record on page 283:

As I understand the rule of law, it is that a presumption arises in all cases, in criminal law or civil law, in favor of the regularity and honesty of the doings, either of individuals or of officials. That is a general presumption of law. When anybody challenges that presumption, it devolves upon that person to overcome that presumption by proof. In this particular case, the expenditure of money in the election may or may not have been honest. The presumption is that it was honest; but in putting in the proof it may appear that the amount of the expenditure was so extravagant as itself to overcome the presumption in favor of the honesty of the transaction, and shift the burden of proof to show that it was an honest expenditure; or it may be accompanied by other badges of suspicion that will overcome the general presumption and shift the burden of proof.

To the same extent he announced that rule, I think, on pages 280 and 281 of the record. A presumption is a mere probable inference which common sense draws from circumstances, usually occurring in the case or in particular surroundings.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. As the Senate will probably recall, I have been interested in this law question as to where the burden of proof lies in this case, it being admitted that one hundred and seven thousand and some odd dollars were expended in the primary election. I called the attention of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], the chairman of the subcommittee, to the matter last Wednesday.

Now, with the permission of the Senator from Iowa, I will read something else I found in going over this testimony as a proposition of law by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], who had charge of the examination as chairman of the subcommittee. I am trying to get at what is the rule, and I only throw out the suggestion and invite the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the matter.

The CHAIRMAN—

That is, the Senator from Idaho—

Mr. HEYBURN. From what page does the Senator from Texas read?

Mr. CULBERSON. From the bottom of page 280.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you realize that if the expenditure of money in a campaign is questioned, the burden is upon the party spending it to show that the expenditure was legitimate?

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not think I realized that. I do not know it now.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Do I understand the chairman to state that as a rule of law?

Now, particularly, I call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to this language of the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. HEYBURN]—

Mr. KENYON. What is the page?

Mr. CULBERSON. I now read from page 281:

The CHAIRMAN. Not that it affects the inquiry now proceeding, but in the judgment of the final tribunal which will be called upon to pass on this testimony—that is, the Senate of the United States—I state it as my opinion of the law that expenditures made by a candidate being challenged as to their legality, the burden is upon the party making the expenditure to show that they were lawful.

Mr. KENYON. I think the Senator later stated that where it was officially challenged.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. I should like to have the Senator read the succeeding paragraph.

Mr. CULBERSON. That is all that I desire to read from the record, and invite the attention of the Senator from Iowa to it, with reference to this question as to where the burden is, in view of the admitted fact that this extraordinary sum was expended in the primary election.

Mr. KENYON. I had understood the record. The statement of the Senator from Idaho first applied when the expenditure was challenged, and later he qualified it by stating when the expenditure was officially challenged, as it was here by the State of Wisconsin, and that then the burden was on the party. Am I correct in that?

Mr. HEYBURN. I think, Mr. President, it would only be fair that the succeeding paragraph should go into the Record in connection with what has been read. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] read the first long paragraph on page 281.

Mr. KENYON. I will read the next paragraph, if the Senator requests me to do so, or he may read it himself.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will call attention to it, because I think it is a material part of the statement which I distinctly remember making. Mr. Littlefield asked:

Then the presumption of innocent expenditure does not follow the item.

The CHAIRMAN. The presumption of innocence does not enter into the question at all. The expenditure being challenged as to its legality, there is no presumption that money expended in connection with an individual campaign by a candidate for office is rightfully expended after it is challenged—

It is the challenge that puts in operation the rule—

After it is challenged in an official way.

It must be an official challenge as contained in these proceedings, for instance.

Prior to the challenge there is a presumption that the expenditure was proper. It being challenged officially, that presumption awaits the determination upon the facts.

I so stated that rule, and I believe my colleagues concurred in it; but it was brought out by an inquiry from Mr. Littlefield as to whether the presumption arose from the mere expenditure. I think, upon reviewing it, that I would not change or add to that statement.

Mr. KENYON. As I remember the record, although I can not place my hand on it at this time, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], in addition to what I have read as to his opinion of the law—I was referring to what I had understood him to state in the record, and if I am incorrect I shall be glad to be corrected—stated, in addition to his opinion, that this expenditure was so large and extravagant as to require explanation—I can not find it just now.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not recall, if the Senator will permit me—

Mr. ROOT. I believe it is on page 281.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is found on page 281.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The statement is here in the record. My statement reads:

Senator SUTHERLAND. Pardon me just a moment, but I should hardly want to be concluded by the statement which the chairman makes. I think the presumption which he says would arise would only arise in case the expenditures were so large, or other circumstances were sufficient, to indicate that the expenditure itself was unlawful.

I do not think that the mere fact that a man had expended money would necessarily give rise to the presumption that it had been unlawfully expended. Is that what the Senator refers to?

Mr. KENYON. No; it is not. I can not refer to it now; but my recollection is, and I am quite certain about it, that the Senator from Utah did say at some point that he considered the expenditure was so large as to require explanation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will pardon me, my position about it all the way through was that this was a very large expenditure of money; that it was so large as to require to be probed, to be investigated, not that it necessarily followed that the burden was upon the man who had expended the money to account for it, but that it was so large as to require investigation and probing into the matter; and that investigation the committee faithfully carried out.

Mr. KENYON. No one questions that. The proposition that I am trying to make is that this large expenditure of money made a prima facie case. It was so unusual, so extravagant, and so shocking to the public conscience that it went in the scale with the presumption of innocence, and whether or not it overcame it must be judged, after all explanation had been made, by the body that has to pass on it, namely, the Senate. In my judgment no sufficient explanation has been made.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I have not yet been able to read more than one of these two large volumes. Is it true—at least I got such an impression from that part of the testimony I have read—that every original entry in the form of memoranda and cards that showed the items for which money was expended was destroyed by those who kept them; and, in addition to the presumption we might indulge from the fact that the expenditure of the money is unduly large, is it fair also to give some weight to the fact that no account was required from those who expended this money, apparently no desire was expressed to have any record kept, or, where a record was kept, all of the original memoranda and all of the original entries were in some manner destroyed? Is that true?

Mr. KENYON. I understand it to be true that the memoranda were destroyed.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Would not the fact that the records showing for what purpose the money was expended were destroyed be entitled to some weight in connection with the large amount of the expenditure?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What Mr. Sacket said about that was this: He had a large number of card indexes that as he would spend money—25 cents, a dollar, or whatever it might be—he would put the items down upon these card indexes; that they accumulated to a very large extent; that the writing upon them gradually became obliterated; that he transferred the items to an account, and then destroyed the original items, because they were cumbersome and because to a large extent the writing upon them had been obliterated. In other words—

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not the original items, but the original cards.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The original cards, because they had become cumbersome and because the writing had been obliterated. In other words, his position was that they were destroyed as so much useless rubbish after he had transferred the items to his account.

Mr. CRAWFORD. May I ask the Senator from Iowa if it is not a fact that in transcribing them, or transferring them, he took the entries that were on a number of cards, cut out the details by which one could tell what the expenditures were for and who received the money, and simply put an aggregate on a piece of paper, which represented in a very brief form the itemized expenditures that were stated on a large number of cards?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. He did that to some extent. I do not now recall exactly to what extent.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to call the Senator's attention to some evidence set forth in the minority report:

Manager Sacket, in testifying as to the payment of an item of $400, stated that he was unable to remember anything about it. He then testified as follows (p. 164):

The CHAIRMAN. That emphasizes the misfortune of the destruction of your memoranda, does it not? Now, you say, in the absence of that memorandum, you can not remember anything about the $400. It may have been used to purchase votes in violation of law, may it not?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. From what page does the Senator read?

Mr. KENYON. I read from page 164. So that clearly when Mr. Sacket was before the committee the misfortune of having destroyed his memoranda was called to his attention by the committee.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me—

Mr. KENYON. Just a moment. On page 479 of the record the Senator will find:

Senator SUTHERLAND. You simply kept a memorandum of these expenditures upon slips of paper, which you afterwards transferred to your cards? That was the way it was done?

Mr. SACKET. I kept them on cards and slips of paper in the card-index box. I afterwards transferred it to typewriting on a sheet of paper.

Senator SUTHERLAND. And then destroyed it and the sheet of paper?

Mr. SACKET. Yes.

Senator SUTHERLAND. And destroyed your cards?

Mr. SACKET. Yes.

Senator SUTHERLAND. And the original memorandum and the slips as well, if you had any slips?

Mr. SACKET. Yes.

Senator SUTHERLAND. When you made these entries upon the slips of paper and upon the cards, did you know the facts?

Mr. SACKET. I might have known the facts, but do not know that I knew all in every case.

I wanted to call attention to a statement of the law as bearing on such a situation as that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will permit me—

Mr. KENYON. Gladly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was going to say that while it is true, as the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] have suggested, that the destruction of these memoranda and the failure to carry all of the items into the transfer account might prevent the witness from stating what the items were for which the money was expended, but it would not prevent his stating with accuracy what they were not spent for, and he stated that no money was expended for the bribery of voters or for any corrupt purposes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Utah if it would not have this effect, that as original testimony, to which third parties could go to ascertain the real truth, it is destroyed, and we are left simply, then, to take the statement of Mr. Sacket, who might not be a fair witness, as to what was expended, as to what it was expended for, or for what it was not expended.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is quite true.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If we could go to those original sources that showed the items, we would have original evidence as to what the money was expended for, but, unfortunately, so far as I have discovered, those original traces, kept at the time by those who made the report, were all destroyed immediately after the campaign closed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. May I interrupt the Senator still further for a moment?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I quite agree with what the Senator from South Dakota says about that. What Mr. Sacket did is unfortunate, and I am not undertaking to excuse it. He ought not to have done it. But let me suggest this thought for the consideration of the Senator from South Dakota: Mr. STEPHENSON was a wealthy man, was known to be wealthy, a man worth, perhaps, a good many million dollars; he was surrounded by a good many people who knew precisely what they wanted anyhow—

Mr. CRAWFORD. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And there was paid to them from time to time large sums of money. It is true that in many instances the witness did not account to my satisfaction for the use of the money; but I was entirely convinced—the Senator from Idaho said the other day that at least one member of the committee was convinced of that fact, and I was that member—I was entirely convinced that a very large portion of the money that went into the hands of these people never went out of their hands at all to serve the purposes of Mr. STEPHENSON; it simply clung to their pockets. I was satisfied that that was the explanation, rather than that they had expended it corruptly for Mr. STEPHENSON's benefit.

Mr. KENYON. Was the Senator convinced of that from the appearance, conduct, or the apparent want of candor of the witnesses upon the stand? That is an advantage which we did not have.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; most of the witnesses who came before the committee impressed me as being pretty decent people. They had that appearance; they were apparently responsible men in the community; and yet I have in my pilgrimage through life once in a while discovered men in politics who, taking money to spend for other people, are not governed by quite the same principles as control them in purely business transactions. Some of the witnesses—I will not particularize, for that might not be fair—were not candid. Some of them gave the appearance of a lack of candor, but, as I have said, on the whole I was quite convinced from the testimony that much of the $107,000 clung to the pockets of those to whom it was paid. I have in mind one man now, without mentioning his name, who received a sum of money—three or four or five thousand dollars. He could give no account of what he did with it, save that he drew out amounts in cash. I do not think that the amounts of money which he drew out in those cash items were expended by him in the election at all. I think they went into his pockets and were used for his own purposes.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator judge that by the number of votes Mr. STEPHENSON received in the election?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; I judge it from all the circumstances, from the testimony, and everything connected with the case.

Mr. KENYON. Referring to the Sacket matter and the destruction of the memoranda, I think the strongest possible inferences and conclusions as a matter of law can be drawn against a situation of that character. It was said in the case of Hunter against Lauder, which was a contested-election case in the Province of Ontario, Canada (Hodgins Election Cases, p. 61):

With regard to the destruction of the accounts and papers, I consider the matter a very grave one. If the case were stripped of all other circumstances but the destruction of the records of the committee and the accounts by a person holding the position of Mr. Perry in the election, I incline at present to think that it would be my duty to draw the strongest possible conclusions against the respondent, and that I should make every presumption against the legality of the acts which were concealed by such conduct. The only safe course for an honest candidate to pursue is to have all papers preserved and to be able to show how all the money was expended. For such a candidate, or any agent of his, to be content with saying he does not know how the money is spent is very unwise.

I should like to inquire of the Senator from Idaho how long he desires to keep us here. I do not want to weary the Senate, although I am perfectly willing to conclude to-night.

Mr. HEYBURN. I inquire how much more time the Senator would like to occupy? I do not want to make it unduly burdensome at all.

Mr. KENYON. Was it the Senator's purpose to move an adjournment? Does he intend to ask to lay this matter aside after I conclude?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; unless the Senator is through at this time.

Mr. KENYON. I am not ready to conclude at this time.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I did not suppose the Senator was. I do not desire to fix the time—

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I will simply say to the Senator from Iowa that those of us who have not had time to examine this testimony want to get all the information we can from those who have patiently gone through it, and I should like to inquire to what extent the Senator finds this situation to prevail in the record: I find in the first volume one instance that I now call to mind particularly, that of the State game warden named Stone, who received $2,500 from Mr. STEPHENSON, and then apparently put that cash in his pocket for the purpose of keeping it. He called a meeting of some of his deputies at the State capitol. I remember particularly one deputy from La Crosse, a Mr. Kingsley, who said that they had a meeting up at the game warden's house and there was what they called a "frame-up"; that is, he had each deputy "plugged" to say, if anybody inquired of him, that he received $500 or $600, or whatever it might be, out of the $2,500, although, as a matter of fact, not one of them had received any of the money, and the game warden was keeping it all. To what extent did that kind of thing appear in the testimony? In other words, to what extent was this $107,000 stolen by middlemen like this game warden rather than being expended to corrupt the voters?

Mr. KENYON. That is the only clear instance I recall, although I do not mean to say other instances might not have occurred.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is the only clear instance the Senator recalls. I have not read any of the second volume, but that instance is certainly quite plain.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President—

Mr. KENYON. I will ask not to be interrupted. I will conclude in a few moments, if not interrupted, and I will be as brief as I can.

Mr. HEYBURN. Very well.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I have discussed the legal phases of this case not as fully as I desire, but as fully as time will permit. I will refer to the evidence briefly and rapidly, for I do not want to weary the Senate and I must close to-night.

My position is that undue influence exerted and brought about in improper ways prevented this from being a free and untrammelled election; that the primary was one of the instrumentalities of the election; and that the practices were such as to destroy the freedom of the election.

The question of agency can not be in doubt. Senator STEPHENSON paid the money into the hands of his managers, his agents, and exercised no supervision over the manner in which the agents were spending the money. Notwithstanding he gave instructions to keep within the law, he did not watch the accounting, but trusted his agents and left them the power of spending the money as they pleased. Such agency is established, therefore, as makes him responsible to the fullest extent for what the agent might do and for what all those employed by the agent might do, not criminally, of course, but for the purpose of this case entirely responsible.

In his testimony Senator STEPHENSON relates how the money was given to Mr. Edmonds, and says:

I know nothing about it only as that return was made to me. I had practically nothing to do with the canvass, and knew nothing about it only where he made that return to me.

His evidence also shows that he himself gave some money to Mr. Reynolds. I think it is a fair dispute as to his giving all the money to Mr. Reynolds, Reynolds then being either a candidate or a prospective candidate for the legislature, but the agency is clearly established and he can reap no benefit from the wrongful act of his agent.

I quote from the testimony of Mr. Edmonds on the general subject of the excessive payments for work done and permitting the money to be expended without any way of keeping track of it:

The CHAIRMAN. I find in the account here attributed to you that the newspaper advertising cost $12,696.76. What other items or class of items would bring that sum up to about $40,000?

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not recall what items are included in that, or what the other large items of expenditure in making up that total are.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by "organizing," as it is used in this statement?

Mr. EDMONDS. My recollection is that he was a railroad man, though I am not certain, and that he was sent out and given $50 to see if he could not line up the railroad men for Senator STEPHENSON.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by lining them up for Senator STEPHENSON?

Mr. EDMONDS. Getting them interested in his election.

The CHAIRMAN. Discussing his election with them?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Paying any money to them for any purpose?

Mr. EDMONDS. That was up to the man's judgment as to whether that was necessary or advisable in the conduct of the campaign for Senator STEPHENSON's election.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that money given to him to expend among the railroad men for cigars or treats of any kind if he saw fit to so expend it?

Mr. EDMONDS. So far as I know he might have expended it in that way.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes. We have no objection to that, not the slightest.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon what date did you have the conversation with Mr. Puellcher in regard to the propriety of paying this $250 to Mr. Bancroft?

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not recall just when. I should say some time during the next week after I got back—as soon as we could get together. I presume it came up the first conversation.

The CHAIRMAN. Was any effort made to recall the money that had been paid to this candidate?

Mr. EDMONDS. Not by me.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there by anybody?

Mr. EDMONDS. Not that I know of.

The CHAIRMAN. Living at Vilas?

Mr. EDMONDS. I think he is living still in Vilas County; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. For what did you pay Mr. Riordan $1,300? Was it for personal services or as a fund to be expended in behalf of Senator STEPHENSON?

Mr. EDMONDS. As a fund to be used by him in his judgment in the interest of Senator STEPHENSON.

The CHAIRMAN. Did he use it?

Mr. EDMONDS. I fully believe he did.

The CHAIRMAN. Did he render you any account?

Mr. EDMONDS. No, sir.

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes, sir; I have no definite knowledge of the use that was made of the money.

The CHAIRMAN. If it should transpire that a wrongful use was made of the money, then I understand that that knowledge has never come to you?

Mr. EDMONDS. It never has come to me; no, sir; not in any instance. The CHAIRMAN. And that you have made no effort to ascertain whether or not the expenditures of this money were wrongful?

Mr. EDMONDS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In any case?

Mr. EDMONDS. I have not.

Senator SUTHERLAND. And the law requires that in that case Mr. STEPHENSON shall state in his report upon information and belief. How can he state upon information and belief unless the information be preserved for him?

Mr. EDMONDS. Only in this way, Senator: By getting from me the information that I had; but there was no possibility of my getting information from Mr. Riordan or others; he could get that from them as well as I could. I did not have to make the report.

Senator SUTHERLAND. Now, Mr. Edmonds, do you not see that under that construction or view of the matter you might have turned over the whole $107,000 to Mr. Riordan and said, "Go out and spend this in Mr. STEPHENSON's interest in the State," and there would have been no way in the world for Mr. STEPHENSON to have known, unless accounts were preserved, how that $107,000 was expended?

Mr. EDMONDS. It never occurred to me that that would be possible or probable.

Senator SUTHERLAND. Do you not see that that could have been done in your view of it?

Mr. EDMONDS. I can understand that; yes, sir.

Senator SUTHERLAND. And it did happen with reference to amounts as large, I think, as $3,500 in one instance?

Mr. EDMONDS. I believe so—$3,200.

Senator SUTHERLAND. You gave to an agent—and I take Mr. Riordan as an example again—the sum of $2,300?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes, sir.

Senator SUTHERLAND. Which greatly exceeds $5?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes, sir.

Senator SUTHERLAND. And you put that $2,300 in his hands, simply telling him to spend it, to use it, in the interest of Mr. STEPHENSON's candidacy?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes, sir.

Senator SUTHERLAND. Without any sort of requirement that he should keep an account of how he spent it, to whom he paid it, or to preserve a record of any of the circumstances which the statute requires; that is true, is it not?

Mr. EDMONDS. I believe I assumed that these men understood the law as well as I, and that in the records in the office, as they were kept by the office manager, the items that we expended from the office, could be explained in detail.

Mr. KENYON. The testimony shows that Mr. Shauers, a candidate for the legislature, was paid money by Edmonds. Mr. Brady was paid $500, but he kept no list and no account of the men employed by him or the money spent or the money paid for speeches which were never made—which would not be a corrupt act, of course, and which, perhaps, was commendable. The following is interesting:

The CHAIRMAN. He was further asked:

"Q. What was that paid for?—A. That was for work in Platteville.

"Q. Anyone else?—A. These, I think, are the large amounts; the others ranged from $2 to $5 and were distributed over the county. Left a trail wherever I went."

Did he ever report to you that he was spending money in that way?

Mr. SACKET. Never.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Leaving a trail.

The CHAIRMAN. You have said you thought that this man rendered an account with you and you left it with the committee?

Mr. SACKET. He rendered an account of the $28.92.

There was plenty of advertising in newspapers, for instance:

The CHAIRMAN. You did not finish as to the "Minneapolis Tidende, $563.79." Where is that paper published?

Mr. SACKET. In Minneapolis, Minn.

The CHAIRMAN. You paid $563.79 for advertising in that paper?

Mr. SACKET. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was your purpose in advertising in a Minneapolis paper?

Mr. SACKET. I was informed that that paper had a very large circulation through the northern and western part of Wisconsin; and we supposed that we should reach the voters through that paper better than through a small local paper in Wisconsin.

Mr. SACKET. The letter "R" simply indicates that there was a receipt, an itemized and receipted bill, filed for that item. The two other items on August 1 indicate that there was a cashier's check, with Mr. Usher's indorsement upon it, produced before the committee, but whether there was an itemized bill or not I could not say positively. My recollection is that there was.

The CHAIRMAN. I want you to be a little more specific in regard to the item on August 1—"H. Rasmussen, cash, $333.33." What was that for?

Mr. SACKET. Advertising.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not for preparing an article, but for the publishing of it, is it?

Mr. SACKET. I do not think we paid anyone except Mr. Usher for preparing articles, and he was paid a regular salary.

The CHAIRMAN. On August 8 you paid the same Mr. Rasmussen, or the Rasmussen Publishing Co., $333.33, and on August 18 you again paid $333.34, making $1,000?

Mr. SACKET. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You paid $1,000 to the Rasmussen Publishing Co. in cash?

Mr. SACKET. Yes, sir.

Money was paid for advertisements; money was given to a Hebrew manager, to a Greek manager, and for advertisements in an Italian newspaper. This, mark you, was not an election for county sheriff, but an election of a man to the Senate of the United States, the most dignified body on earth.

This from Edmonds is likewise interesting:

Senator SUTHERLAND. Then you would, in the beginning of the employment, simply make an estimate of what the work would cost in that particular county?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Senator SUTHERLAND. And that amount of money was paid to the organizer in the first instance?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Senator SUTHERLAND. And he was not required thereafter to make any accounting as to the way in which he had expended the money or to furnish you with an itemized statement?

Mr. EDMONDS. No, sir.

The testimony shows that money was paid to Mr. Gust for the purpose of enthusing the voters—and this in an election for United States Senator!

The CHAIRMAN—

This language is significant—

The CHAIRMAN. There seems to have been a general apathy. These men whom you employed to get out the vote for Senator STEPHENSON seem to have managed to get out 56,839 votes out of 470,480 votes in the State. Had you not employed these men, would Senator STEPHENSON have gotten any votes at all?

Mr. EDMONDS. Not very many.

The following from Perrin's testimony is interesting:

Mr. PERRIN. This statute has never received in practical operation, by anybody that I know of in the State of Wisconsin, the construction which has been suggested here. It is the common, ordinary thing throughout northern Wisconsin to take a man to the theater or take him to lunch, not necessarily to corrupt his mind, but to enlighten him. You do these things to get a man's mind in a receptive mood. You can not go after him, Senator, you know, with an ax and beat an idea into him. It has got to be worked out along practical lines. It seems foolish for me to sit here and talk to you gentlemen about this thing, because you know so much more about it than I do.

Practical lines in this matter were money lines:

Senator POMERENE. Not one of them?

Mr. PERRIN. Not one of them.

Senator POMERENE. I think I gave Senator HEYBURN a wrong sum total of certain expenditures here. In going over in detail this account, which you filed with the committee, you gave the following sums as having been paid to Fridley: $300, $50, $50, and $50; to R. J. Shields, $5, $75, and $250; to Savage, $25, $50, $25, and $25; to Lamere and Hamilton, $6.25; to J. W. Wilson, $100 and $10; to D. M. Maxcy, $25 and $25; to T. W. McManus, $45; to the Duluth News-Tribune, $40; to Nelson, $27; to the Bayfield Press, $25; and for telegraph, telephone, etc., $45, making a total, if my footings are correct, of $1,503.25. Do you mean to tell us that out of the sum of $5,000 furnished you, that is all that you can account for so far as the names of the payees are concerned?

Mr. PERRIN. Yes, except this: I stated on my examination that I had given Mr. Fridley more money, as I remembered, than appears there; and I think I gave Mr. Wilson more money, but I am not sure about that.

The CHAIRMAN. Then do you know how he expended this money, all or part of it, in specific terms?

Mr. PERRIN. Not in specific terms.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is C. R. Fridley?

Mr. PERRIN. He is an attorney at Superior.

The CHAIRMAN. Is he an old resident?

Mr. PERRIN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is he an old man or a young man?

Mr. PERRIN. He is a man of 42 or 43 years of age.

The CHAIRMAN. Did he support Senator STEPHENSON for nomination at the primaries and before the primaries?

Mr. PERRIN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Was he in public life in any capacity?

Mr. PERRIN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. He was what you call a political worker, was he?

Mr. PERRIN. No. He was a practicing lawyer.

The CHAIRMAN. He was actively engaged in the practice of law?

Mr. PERRIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You never asked him for any accounting as to the expense he had incurred?

Mr. PERRIN. I did not.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator a brief question?

Mr. KENYON. Make it brief, if you please.

Mr. NELSON. Very brief. Would it be corruption for an orator of a socialistic temper to enthrone voters by his speeches?

Mr. KENYON. The Senator is assuming, of course, that they would be enthused. [Laughter.]

There is testimony in regard to "organization." All through this record is evidence that money was paid for this intangible thing that is called "organization." It is elusive; no one understands what it means. Men rush into STEPHENSON's office and tell him they are for him, then they go out and organize, and money is furnished to help; the evidence shows that many of them were organized pretty thoroughly before they got through.

Then there is the testimony of Mr. Riordan, who got $2,300. The evidence fails to show how large a part of it was expended.

Mr. Sacket's testimony has been discussed pretty thoroughly by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], and I am not going to spend any time as to him. Mr. PERRIN has been also discussed, but there is one phase of his testimony to which attention has not been called that I am inclined to think the Senate ought to consider. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] asked him this question:

Do you think this law was intended to be evaded?

Mr. PERRIN. Certainly not.

Senator POMERENE. You have said in answer to Senator SUTHERLAND—I want to quote you correctly, and if I do not you will correct me—that you probably paid money to 100 different persons, though you were not definite as to your statement.

Mr. PERRIN. No; I can not be.

Senator POMERENE. I understand that. You also said to him again in your examination that you knew personally very many of the men that you employed.

Mr. PERRIN. Yes.

Senator POMERENE. Do you mean to tell the committee that you do not now remember any of the men to whom you paid this money, outside of the few names that you gave to Senator HEYBURN?

Mr. PERRIN. That is just exactly what I mean to say.

This man did not account for $2,000 of the money given him. He gave money to a hundred different persons, and could not tell over five of them, the amounts, or their names.

Mr. Bancroft gives some very illuminating testimony, to which reference has been made. I refer to only this part of it.

I ought to say that what I am reading now is in the report which I understood the subcommittee had before it of the legislative investigation—

The CHAIRMAN (reading)—

It does not say what the chairman was reading, but I assume he was reading from that report—

"The result of our conference was that I, being pretty well acquainted with the county and knowing who the political workers were in the county, consented to disburse this amount of money for Mr. STEPHENSON."

Is that correct?

Mr. BANCROFT. That is correct.

Gordon was an evasive witness. Under the sharp cross-examination of the Senator from Utah he could not remember whether he had paid a dollar or a thousand dollars until he was pinned down to where he could evade no longer the skilled examiner. His language does not exhibit the candor one would expect from a man in his position.

Mehaffy was given a hundred dollars, and never asked what he expended it for. Then there is Mr. Wayland. The Senator from Kansas has referred to this lively gentleman who employed the seven pretty girls and exercised a wise political discrimination. It is amazing no more votes were secured in that particular precinct. He also pinned the buttons on the babies and put an extra piece of pie and a cigar at the table. There was not very much harm in that. He is the same gentleman who took with him a man who bankrupted breweries by increasing their production. But there is not anything very bad about Wayland. He put in his account $17.15 for headaches, and certainly that was as specific as anybody ought to want. And this, mark you, was an election for United States Senator; from reading the evidence no one would imagine it, hence it is essential to keep that fact before us.

Riordan failed to account for the money he received. O'Connor was the gentleman who spent $307 in one afternoon for drinks and $1.86 for something to eat. He left a trail behind him, too. Wellensgard I have referred to. Mr. French kept no account. Mr. French received about $1,800 in money and left it with people whom he did not know. For instance, at the ice houses, to bring men to the polls. Any corrupt influence in that? Any undue influence exerted upon a voter? Anything to show a well-conceived plan to carry this election by the use of money? Here is Thayer with $600 unaccounted for. Another one spending money in saloons. Pollock, a newspaper man, who understood the proposition brought to him was a proposition of bribery. That was his opinion. He gives the facts and circumstances as to how they tried to get him. Dee, the editor of the Chippewa Herald, has been discussed fully, the money given to him was a bribe—nothing else.

The testimony of Mr. Stone has been referred to by the Senator from South Dakota. There is nothing in the record to show how much of the money Stone had went for corrupt purposes. Stone, as a State official, gathered into his room the game wardens, and he had $2,500 of the dirty money in his pocket and he asked the game wardens to assume that they had had some of this money in the investigation then pending in the Wisconsin Legislature. They agreed to do it if they did not have to go on the stand and perjure themselves. Stone accounts for some of this money. A fine State officer was Stone. It is not true that in the record there is absolutely no accounting for it, because he attempted to make an accounting, but it is a very lame one.

Rosenheim handing out—

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KENYON. I do for a question.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Iowa has just referred to the Stone episode and to the conference which took place between him and his deputies. This was at a time when the legislative investigation was going on. It was after the primary election and after the election by the general assembly. How does the Senator hold Senator STEPHENSON responsible for the shortcomings of Mr. Stone and his deputies when they were attempting to frame up some explanation of their acts in disposing of this money? Is there anything in the record which tends to connect Senator STEPHENSON with their acts?

Mr. KENYON. Are you through with the question?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. I do not hold him responsible for it. I am merely referring to it as showing the plan and scheme of the men who were carrying this matter on and the iniquity of the whole miserable business. He was an agent of STEPHENSON. He received the money directly from STEPHENSON, as the record shows. What he did with it never will be known.

Mr. POMERENE. So far as concerns the Senator's comments upon the conduct of those men, I am in entire accord with him.

Mr. KENYON. I am glad to hear it.

The testimony and transaction surrounding witness Pestalozzi has been gone over by the Senator from Kansas. I will not take further time thereon. There was apparently an attempt to buy his influence.

Mr. KERN. I will ask if the testimony just referred to does not throw some light upon the character of the men to whom these large sums of money were intrusted by Senator STEPHENSON?

Mr. KENYON. There is no question about it—a flood of light. I am not going to spend any more time on this evidence. I could talk a good while about it, but the hour is late, and I must stop. This evidence shows, in my judgment, upon careful analysis, a general scheme and plan of corruption, a securing of a primary election by money, and nothing else. There was no great issue that tried men's souls or that aroused any patriotic enthusiasm. It was just a question of the longest purse. It shows one man giving money to a hundred different persons and no accounting except by five of them. It shows this man accounting for only $1,500 out of $5,000. It shows another failing to account for $1,500 out of $3,200. It shows money given to candidates either for the legislature or prospective candidates, three of whom were elected and three of whom were defeated. It shows money left with men whom the agent did not know. It shows over $300 spent in one afternoon for drinks. It shows excessive treating, excessive employment of men, excessive number of men at the polls. It shows a payment of $2,500 to the game warden of the State, a State officer. It shows money paid to newspapers, fairly presumed to be for their influence. It shows at least one attempt to bribe a newspaper. It shows an election that can not under the law be considered a free and untrammelled election. It was carried by the reckless and wrongful use of money.

Mr. President, I want to refer in closing to the report and to quote a few words from the great debate in the Senate in the Payne case. It was charged there that the views of the minority contained a startling proposition, never before announced in the Senate, and one which had never received a moment's consideration, where the minority said:

As the Senate is the only court that can properly try this question, so the charge is made, if not in the only way it can be made yet certainly in the way beyond all others in which it can be made with most authority. * * * For the Senate to refuse to listen to this complaint so made would, it seems to us, be, and be everywhere taken to be, a declaration that it is indifferent to the question whether its seats are to be in the future the subject of bargain and sale, or may be presented by a few millionaires as a compliment to a friend.

Senator Frye, that great Senator from Maine who presided over this body so many years and whose life and services we are to commemorate in a few days, said in debate:

I know, and so do they (referring to the people), that a man of great wealth who loves money easily grows into the idea that money is God—omnipotent, omniscient—can do whatever it pleases, and go whithersoever it may. I know that he preceeds upon the hypothesis that it can purchase anything he seeks or anything his heart may want. I know that he names his price for every man and declares that he can find a price that will fit.

And further:

Sir, if popular government is still an experiment and shall become a failure, the failure will be the legitimate result of unfaithful citizenship. If this Republic shall be wrecked upon the shoals, the rock upon which it breaks shall be named corruption of the ballot. The ballot box is the fountain head of government of the people. Whosoever defiles that destroys the whole.

The Senate can engage in no holier or more responsible duty than to devote itself to a work, however painful and disagreeable, that may result in a warning—a terrible warning—which shall sound from the East to the West, from the North to the South, declaring, with no uncertain voice, that corruption by money power of the citizen at the polls or of a legislature shall cease now.

That was a great conservative Republican Senator. I have no malice in this matter, nothing but sorrow for this situation. I wish this record did not make it incumbent on me as a member of the minority, following my conscience and duty as I see it, as the gentlemen of the majority have followed their consciences and duty as they see it, to vote differently on this proposition.

I believe this election is, as Lord Coke said in the Long case, "tainted at its fountain." The methods employed would not have dignified a candidacy for county sheriff. The election was the result of an organized riot of corruption, a debauchery of the electorate by treating, employment, purchases of newspaper influence, and other despicable methods, creating by money political enthusiasm and securing political support. Such practices should cease and cease now. Otherwise the canker of corruption will eat close to the heart of the Republic. The only real danger that can ever threaten this Nation in the future is corruption in the body politic. It is the child of avarice and special privilege. It can exist only when the electorate is indifferent. They may be slow to be aroused, but when once aroused the American people will drive the money changers from the temple and smite the arrogant demon of corruption wherever its vile head may appear.

The seats in this body do not belong to the highest bidder; the property, the lives, the sacred honor of 90,000,000 people rest in the keeping of this body. If its seats are to be bought and sold as merchandise, then, indeed, the decadence of the Republic is nigh.

Why mince words? Every man in this body knows that the election of Senator STEPHENSON was brought about by the reckless, extravagant, and wrongful use of money. You may gloss it over, smile about it, condone it, but the fact still exists—the seat was purchased.

If men can be sent here by money, others can be defeated by money, and there are men in this Chamber who know what it means to have the purses of great interests opened to defeat them. We are marching on; no one need be discouraged; the people, not money, are going to rule in this country. We are advancing.

In the Payne case Senator Frye, the conservative, brainy, and honest Senator from Maine, pleaded with the Senate to investigate the charges that the Standard Oil Co. had, through its agents and officers, put its hands upon a legislative body and undertaken to control and elect a Member of the United States Senate. He could not even secure a hearing. He there said:

It is the solemn duty of the United States Senate to see to it that Oliver H. Payne and Messrs. McLean and Thompson and Huntington and Page and every other agent, if there are others, of the Standard Oil Co., shall come before a committee of the United States Senate and, under oath, state whether or not they purchased a seat of a United States Senator.

Judge Thurman, with relation to the Payne case, said at that time in an interview:

The Democratic clock is put back four years, and corruption is given a new leasehold in our land; syndicates purchase the people's votes, and honest men stand agast.

We at least have had an investigation, a thorough one, and as the lid has been lifted men have been sickened by the foul odors that came from the cauldron of corruption. There is no divinity that surrounds a seat in this body acquired by such methods, no reason to talk in whispers concerning it, but boldly to brand it, as it is, a purchased seat.

Above any other question is the great one of public policy. A man who turns loose this enormous sum of money to secure a seat here is not, as a matter of public policy, entitled to remain a Member of this body; even were the election legal he should be expelled.

The minority offer no apology for their action. It has been an unpleasant duty, but we have the consciousness at least of not voting to approve methods and practices in an election condemned by the majority as expenditures "in violation of the fundamental principles underlying our system of Government."

During the delivery of Mr. KENYON's speech,

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). Will the Senator from Iowa suspend for a moment? The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3812) to regulate public utilities in the District of Columbia and to confer upon the Commissioners of the District of Columbia the duties and powers of a public-utilities commission.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Can the Senator from New Hampshire indicate how long he will be disposed to continue to lay it aside, because I am quite interested in the amendment we agreed to the other day consenting to what is called the half-and-half business for the District of Columbia. I want to be sure to be here when it comes up.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will assure the Senator from Georgia that the bill will not be finally acted upon in his absence. I could not give any further assurance. After the Senator from Georgia has been here awhile longer he will find that not only must the unfinished business give way to a privileged question, but it must give way to any Senator who desires to make a speech on any subject.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I realize that there is a great deal for me to learn after I have been here awhile longer. It was just that I might keep up with the practice that I asked the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to laying aside the unfinished business temporarily? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Iowa will proceed.

At the conclusion of Mr. KENYON's speech,

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 5, 1912, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, March 4, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, imbue us plenteously with heavenly gifts that our minds may be clarified and our hearts made pure that these Thy servants may see clearly, act wisely, and, with statesmanlike fervor, solve the problems which confront them with an eye single to Thy glory and uplift of our people that good government may more and more obtain. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, March 2, 1912, was read and approved.

INVITATION OF THE CITY OF NEW ORLEANS.

Mr. DUPRE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DUPRE. Mr. Speaker, the National Drainage Congress will meet in the city of New Orleans on the 10th day of April, and will cover in its discussions matters of drainage, transportation, reclamation, and similar matters, in which all of us are interested. The local authorities have asked me to extend in this informal manner an invitation to the Speaker of the House and to the Members of this body, or as many of them as possibly can attend, to be present on that occasion. In behalf of the people of New Orleans, I hope the Speaker and the Members of the House will be able to take advantage of this opportunity to come to the Crescent City. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5075. An act for the establishment of a new land district in the State of Montana.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2453) for the relief of Benjamin F. Martz, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had receded from its amendment No. 3 to the bill (H. R. 13570) to amend an act entitled "An act granting to certain employees of the United States the right to receive from it compensation for injuries sustained in the course of their employment," approved May 30, 1908.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 5075. An act for the establishment of a new land district in the State of Montana; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee, by the direction of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported the bill (H. R. 21279) making appropriation for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes (H. Rept. 388), which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. MANN and Mr. FINLEY reserved all points of order on the bill.

AMERICAN NATIONAL RED CROSS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 16306) to provide for the use of the American National Red Cross in aid of the land and naval forces in time of actual or threatened war.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Whereas the American National Red Cross was incorporated by act of Congress approved January 5, 1905, "To furnish volunteer aid to the sick and wounded of armies in time of war, in accordance with the spirit and conditions of * * * the treaty of Geneva of August 22, 1864": Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever in time of war, or when war is imminent, the President may deem the cooperation and use of the American National Red Cross with the sanitary services of the land and naval forces to be necessary, he is authorized to accept the assistance tendered by the said Red Cross and to employ the same under the sanitary services of the Army and Navy in conformity with such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

SEC. 2. That when the Red Cross cooperation and assistance with the land and naval forces in time of war or threatened hostilities shall have been accepted by the President, the personnel entering upon the duty specified in section 1 of this act shall, while proceeding to their place of duty, while serving thereat, and while returning therefrom, be transported and subsisted at the cost and charge of the United States as civilian employees employed with the said forces, and the Red Cross supplies that may be tendered as a gift and accepted for use in the sanitary service shall be transported at the cost and charge of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask an explanation of this bill.

[At this point Mr. McDERMOTT assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.]

Mr. STEDMAN. Mr. Speaker, I hope there will be no objection to the consideration of this bill. The object of it is to authorize the President of the United States to accept the services of the American Red Cross Society in time of war or when war is imminent. The bill further provides that all the expense of the personnel of the Red Cross Society, their transportation to the field of service, their service thereat, and their return therefrom shall be borne by the Government of the United States, and that the transportation of any supplies furnished by the society without expense to the Government shall also be carried free of charge. It might not be amiss, Mr. Speaker, in just a very few words, to state the origin of the American Red Cross Society.

These Red Cross Societies owed their origin first to the convention in Geneva, Switzerland, in 1863, which recommended that a committee in every country should be appointed to aid the hospital service of its armies in times of war. The conventions in 1864 and 1906 in Geneva gave a more definite status to these societies and enlarged their operations, extending them to all great calamities wherever they might occur throughout the world.

Carrying out the idea originating at Geneva, the Congress of the United States on the 15th of January, 1905, incorporated the American National Red Cross Society. It did not confine its operations to times of war, but extended them to all great calamities, such as pestilence and famines, wherever they might occur throughout the world. Since 1905 this society has expended $6,000,000 in aiding and assisting those suffering from great calamities, as, for example, at San Francisco in the year 1906, during the great disaster caused by the earthquake and fire; at Cherry, Ill., in 1909; in Palos, Ala., in 1910; during the prevalence of the forest fires in the State of Minnesota in 1910; and during the volcanic eruptions of Mount Taal in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. CONNELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONNELL. The House is not in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point is well taken. The House will be in order.

Mr. STEDMAN. The agents of this society have been found aiding and succoring the afflicted and distressed everywhere throughout this country in time of calamity. Nor, Mr. Speaker, has its operations been confined to this continent. Wherever throughout the world calamities have befallen any people, you will find the agents of this society. During the plague in Manchuria in 1911, and during the famine in the valley of Yellow River in China in 1911, a famine which attracted the attention and the sympathy of the whole world, the agents of this society could be found.

I said that primarily the object of this society was to help, aid, and assist the hospital service in time of war, and so it is, Mr. Chairman, upon every field of battle where the armies of this Republic have stood. It matters not from what section they have come—from the North, the East, the South, or the West—they have illustrated the highest type of manhood. I trust it may not be so, but war may come to us again, and then we shall have to send the young men of this country to the battle field. Is it too much for them to expect or too much for humanity to demand that we shall do all that is within our power to alleviate the sufferings incident to the battle field?

This is an age conspicuous for selfishness and greed of gain. Notwithstanding the characteristics of the age, the American National Red Cross Society can be seen everywhere with its banner of humanity, charity, and kindness—wherever can be found distress and suffering. I think, Mr. Chairman, that every Member of this House ought to be glad to vote for this bill, and I trust they so will do. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt at all about the efficacy of the Red Cross in a great many cases, but the Army of the United States is very well equipped with a very large and extravagant Medical Corps and Hospital Corps, and I do not see the need, nor from what I have been able to catch from the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina, have I been able to discover any reason why we should at this time pass a law which provides for the immediate incorporation into the Army of the United States of the National Red Cross, at a very great expense, when the Army already has its own Medical Corps and its own Hospital Corps, fit to contend with any conditions that may arise. If any emergency should arise in time of war we could very well, if it were necessary, ask the aid of this Red Cross Society.

Mr. STEDMAN. Mr. Speaker, will my friend allow me to interrupt him?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. STEDMAN. The bill provides only what the gentleman suggests. It provides that only in case of emergencies shall the society extend its aid; only in cases of emergency when it is necessary; and until that emergency arises there is no expense whatsoever.

Mr. HAY. Yes; but my idea is that these emergencies are always thought to be present when parties desire to be in the service of the United States.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me this suggestion?

Mr. STEDMAN. Certainly.

Mr. KENDALL. The fact whether or not there is an emergency is always a matter to be determined in the discretion of the President?

Mr. STEDMAN. Yes; whenever he deems it necessary.

Mr. KENDALL. Whenever he deems it necessary for the Government to avail itself of this corps.

Mr. STEDMAN. And nothing is done until he does.

Mr. KENDALL. There is no expense at all unless the President deems it necessary.

Mr. HAY. But it may be possible that the Congress might want to decide whether it was necessary to take into the service of the United States a very large and expensive corps of this kind when there is already, as I have said before, a Medical Corps and a Hospital Corps which can be increased and made more efficient in time of war.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is it not true that in time of war the Hospital Corps must in some way be rapidly increased?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And that if the Army were able to make use at once of an organized Hospital Corps through the Red Cross, it will be that much better off than it would to wait and recruit it from civil life.

Mr. HAY. But in this bill you are not placing this Red Cross Society under the control of the Army, and that is very important.

Mr. STEDMAN. If I may interrupt the gentleman, I wish to say he is mistaken.

Mr. MANN. It says the President shall determine.

Mr. STEDMAN. The gentleman is mistaken about that. It is in conjunction with the sanitary service of the Army and Navy and in conformity with the rules laid down.

Mr. MANN. In conformity with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield for an interruption?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. How did this bill get to the Foreign Affairs Committee?

Mr. HAY. I do not know how it got there. It does not belong there, and I will state that the Senate bill was passed and referred to the Military Affairs Committee.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The same bill?

Mr. HAY. The same bill.

Mr. KENDALL. If the gentleman will allow me this suggestion I hope there will not be any objection made to this bill simply on a controversy as to jurisdiction. I assume the gentleman is correct in the suggestion that the bill ought to have gone to the Committee on Military Affairs; but an identical bill, I think, has passed the Senate, as I understand it, unanimously, and is now in possession of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HAY. That is true.

Mr. KENDALL. The Committee on Foreign Affairs had no knowledge whatever of that reference. It reported this bill, which is now here for unanimous consent.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Did not the Committee on Foreign Affairs know that the bill did not really belong to it?

Mr. KENDALL. The Committee on Foreign Affairs know a great many things.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman does not answer my question. [Laughter.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HAY. I do.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, just a few words. This bill relating to the Red Cross was introduced by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. KENDALL. He is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SULZER. Yes; the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, and he and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD], who is a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, took the matter up and agreed that the Committee on Foreign Affairs should have jurisdiction of this bill. The Committee on Foreign Affairs granted a hearing, and afterwards unanimously reported the bill. It is a good bill and in the interest of the Government. All that it does is to give the Government of the United States the right to utilize the services of the nurses of the Red Cross in time of exigency as well as in war. It has the right to do so now in war. This gives the Government the right to do so in time of peace if the case be urgent. If the Government does call on the Red Cross for nurses in cases of exigency, then the Government will, of course, pay the transportation of the nurses and for their subsistence while in the service. That is substantially all this bill does. I have here a letter about the bill from the Red Cross, which I desire to read:

AMERICAN RED CROSS, NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS,
ROOM 341, STATE, WAR, AND NAVY BUILDING,
Washington, D. C., February 23, 1912.

Hon. WILLIAM SULZER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SULZER: The bill "To provide for the use of the American National Red Cross in aid of the land and naval forces in time of actual or threatened war" was thought advisable by the war relief board of the Red Cross, of which Surg. Gen. Torney is chairman and Surg. Gen. Stokes vice chairman, because of the fact that in time of war or if war were threatened the assistance of the Red Cross might be immediately desired. If at such time any of its personnel was simply taken into the actual service this personnel would become part of the regular Medical Corps and the Government would naturally meet all expenses. On the other hand, it is highly probable that the Government would desire at base hospitals, on hospital ships, on ambulance trains, etc., to avail itself of the extra trained personnel which the Red Cross could provide.

In such cases the society would meet the salaries of this personnel, but as it would be placed under the control of the Surgeon Generals' offices of the War and Navy Departments, these departments and not the Red Cross would transfer and assign to duty this personnel while utilizing its services. At such times the arrangements for transportation and for subsistence are entirely in the hands of the Government. For this reason it was considered advisable and desirable for the Government to assume the cost and charge of the transportation and subsistence of this personnel while utilizing its services as well as the cost and charge of the transportation of such Red Cross supplies as may be accepted for use in the sanitary service.

The bill does not provide for any expenditure by the Government for Red Cross assistance save in time of actual or threatened war, and only then when the services of the Red Cross are accepted by the President for active duty.

Gen. George W. Davis, chairman of the Red Cross central committee, has provided further information in regard to this matter to Hon. CHARLES M. STEDMAN, chairman of the subcommittee which had the bill under consideration.

Yours, sincerely,

MABEL T. BOARDMAN.

Mr. HAY. I know all about that. It is not necessary to discuss that.

Mr. SULZER. That is all this bill does. It is a meritorious measure and should be passed.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman from New York permit a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN]?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I want to ask the gentleman from New York, who has been here almost from the time the Constitution was adopted, or since the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, and is perfectly familiar with the rules of the House—

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will be here as long as I am.

Mr. SLAYDEN (continuing). If he did not know that his committee was taking jurisdiction of a bill not properly belonging to it?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I left that to the gentleman's colleague on the Military Affairs Committee, Mr. ANTHONY.

Mr. SLAYDEN. He is not a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, out of deference to my friend from North Carolina [Mr. STEDMAN], and what he has said, I will not object.

Mr. SULZER. And out of deference to your friend from New York. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEDMAN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SOUTHERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF TEXAS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 14083) to create a new division of the southern district of Texas, and to provide terms of court at Corpus Christi, Tex., and for a clerk to said court, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the counties of Bee, Live Oak, Aransas, San Patricio, Nueces, Jim Wells, Duval, Brooks, and Willacy shall constitute a division of the southern judicial district of Texas.

SEC. 2. That terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the said southern district of Texas shall be held twice in each year at the city of Corpus Christi, in Nueces County, and that, until otherwise provided by law, the judges of said courts shall fix the times at which said courts shall be held at Corpus Christi, of which they shall make publication and give due notice.

SEC. 3. That all civil process issued against persons resident in the said counties of Bee, Live Oak, Aransas, San Patricio, Nueces, Jim Wells, Duval, Brooks, and Willacy, and cognizable before the United States courts, shall be made returnable to the courts, respectively, to be held at the city of Corpus Christi, and all prosecutions for offenses committed in any of said counties shall be tried in the appropriate United States court at the city of Corpus Christi: Provided, That no process issued or prosecution commenced or suit instituted before the passage of this act shall be in any way affected by the provisions hereof.

SEC. 4. That the clerks of the circuit and district courts of said division shall maintain an office, in charge of themselves or a deputy, at the said city of Corpus Christi, which shall be kept open at all times for the transaction of the business of said division.

The committee amendments were read as follows:

In line 6, page 1, strike out the words "circuit and" and in line 12, page 2, strike out the words "circuit and."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like first to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] whether he would be willing to correct the phraseology of the bill so as to make it conform with these amendments that have already been recommended by the committee. It will require nine amendments.

Mr. GARNER. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I am always willing to correct the phraseology of any bill to conform with grammatical language, especially if suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, because he is usually correct in phraseology.

Mr. MANN. It would be very difficult to object after that statement, but I would like to know what is the necessity of the bill?

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Illinois doubtless has the report of the Committee on the Judiciary before him.

Mr. MANN. That is true, but it has no report from the Department of Justice in it.

Mr. GARNER. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is customary for the Committee on the Judiciary to consider these matters without reference to the views of the Department of Justice. I remember very distinctly five years ago when the President vetoed three bills that were passed by this House, recommended by the Judiciary Committee, and finally these bills were reconsidered by the House and passed as one bill, and the President signed it after they had been refused and thoroughly repudiated by the Department of Justice.

Mr. MANN. That is no reason why we should not have the opinion of the Department of Justice. The report states that this bill meets with the approval of the district judge and the district attorney of this district.

Mr. GARNER. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that I have seen a letter addressed by Judge Burns to a member of the commercial club at Corpus Christi, in which he says unofficially, without the matter being referred to him for official action, he had no objection to the establishment of this court.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know whether the Department of Justice has any objection?

Mr. GARNER. I do not know; I have not talked with the Attorney General about it. I do know of the necessity of the court, and it is the unanimous opinion of the bar and of the people in that section of the country that there ought to be a court established at this point. The Government has expended three and a half million dollars in establishing deep water at Aransas Pass Harbor. It is in Nueces County, and Corpus Christi is the county seat of that county. Ships from different portions of the world will be landing commerce there, and I think the gentleman from Illinois would agree that there ought to be a court established there to take care of that particular commerce.

Mr. MANN. No; admiralty cases have gone out of date; there are very few of them now, but if the gentleman himself will say that he believes that this division of the district ought to be created, I shall take his judgment.

Mr. GARNER. I can say to the gentleman that I never have introduced a bill in Congress that I thought had more merit than this.

Mr. MANN. That is a little ambiguous.

Mr. GARNER. That might be an evasive answer, but I will say candidly that I believe the court ought to be established, and it is in the interest of economy.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, in that connection I think the facts that are recited in the report show that this court ought to be established.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 6, strike out the words "circuit and," and page 2, line 14, strike out the words "circuit and."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by changing the word "courts," in line 6, page 1, to "court," and in line 10, page 1, by striking out the words "judges" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "judge," and in the same line, striking out the word "courts" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "court"; and on page 2, line 1, by striking out the word "courts" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "court."

Also, page 2, line 7, strike out the word "courts" and insert in lieu thereof the word "court," and in lines 9 and 10 strike out the words "appropriate United States" and insert in lieu thereof the word "district."

Also, page 2, line 4, strike out the word "clerks" and insert in lieu thereof the word "clerk," and in the same line strike out the word "courts" and insert in lieu thereof the word "court."

Also, page 2, lines 15 and 16, strike out the word "themselves" and insert in lieu thereof the word "himself."

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, this bill was reported by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NYE], and I would like to have his judgment as to these amendments.

Mr. NYE. Mr. Speaker, I had not seen the bill. I supposed it was to be redrafted.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I will say for the information of the House that I am entirely responsible for the errors. In drawing the amendments suggested by the committee I did not take into consideration the question of changing the plural to the singular after having stricken out the words "circuit and" in line 6, on page 1, and in line 14, on page 2.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. NYE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSISSIPPI RIVER AT MEMPHIS, TENN.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 17239) to authorize Arkansas & Memphis Railway Bridge & Terminal Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad and highway bridge across the Mississippi River.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Arkansas & Memphis Railway Bridge & Terminal Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Tennessee, its successors and assigns, be, and are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge, and all approaches thereto, across the Mississippi River at Memphis, Tenn., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That said Arkansas & Memphis Railway Bridge & Terminal Co., its successors and assigns, now or at any time hereafter, may, and is hereby, further authorized and empowered to make separate provision by addition to the railroad bridge structure for the passage of wagons and vehicles of all kinds, for the transit of animals, and for foot passengers.

SEC. 3. That said Arkansas & Memphis Railway Bridge & Terminal Co., its successors and assigns, may charge and receive such reasonable rates of toll for the passage of railway trains of all kinds, for the passage of passengers travelling upon said railway trains, for the passage of wagons and vehicles of all kinds, for the transit of animals, and for foot passengers crossing such bridge as may be approved from time to time by the Secretary of War: Provided, however, That such reasonable rates of tolls so approved by the Secretary of War shall not exceed the sum of 25 cents for each passage over said bridge by passengers upon railway trains crossing same.

SEC. 4. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendments:

Line 6, page 1, strike out the word "railroad."

Line 8, page 1, after the word "Tennessee," insert the words "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation."

Page 1, line 11, after the word "six," add the words:

"Provided, That said bridge shall be so constructed, maintained, and operated that in addition to its use for railroad trains and trolley cars it shall provide for a separate roadway and approaches and continuous use by the public as a highway bridge to be used by vehicles, pedestrians, horsemen, animals, and all kinds of highway traffic and travel, for the transit of which reasonable rates of toll may be charged and received, but no rate for passage of a single passenger on a railroad train shall exceed 25 cents."

Strike out sections 2 and 3.

Renumber section 4 so as to read "Sec. 2."

Amend the title so as to read: "To authorize Arkansas & Memphis Railway Bridge & Terminal Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to know something of the effect of the passage of this bill upon the navigation of the Mississippi River.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not see how it would affect it any, as it is to be constructed at a point suitable to the interests of navigation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it proposed to build the bridge across the Mississippi River itself?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. You know that we are expending a great deal of money in improving the navigation of the Mississippi River.

Mr. ADAMSON. The provisions of the bill and the report of the War Department amply take care of navigation. We are providing to have one bridge for all purposes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And this bridge, so far as the judgment of the committee is concerned, will not affect the navigation of the Mississippi River?

Mr. ADAMSON. Not at all, and the War Department so states.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Government will not be put to any expense for the construction of this bridge?

Mr. ADAMSON. Not a cent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 6, strike out the word "railroad" at the end of line 6 and beginning of line 7. Page 1, line 8, insert after the word "Tennessee" the words "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation."

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to. The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 2, insert after the word "six" the following: Provided, That said bridge shall be so constructed, maintained, and operated that in addition to its use for railroad trains and trolley cars it shall provide for a separate roadway and approaches and continuous use by the public as a highway bridge to be used by vehicles, pedestrians, horsemen, animals, and all kinds of highway traffic and travel, for the transit of which reasonable rates of toll may be charged and received, but no rate for passage of a single passenger on a railroad train shall exceed 25 cents.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. This amendment provides that tolls may be charged which shall be reasonable rates of toll. Of course, that is a legislative enactment. It might require the construction of a court to determine what are reasonable rates of toll. As I recall the general bridge act, it authorizes the Secretary of War to determine what are reasonable rates of toll. I do not call this to the attention of the gentleman for the purpose of opposing the amendment, but for the purpose of suggesting to whoever is interested in this bill the desirability of not having a conflict between two authorities as to who shall determine what is a reasonable rate of toll. The general bridge act confides it to the Secretary of War.

Mr. ADAMSON. This is governed by that in all respects.

Mr. MANN. Oh, it is except as it is modified, and where we say it shall be a reasonable rate of toll it may be that will require a construction of the act to determine what is a reasonable rate of toll, because we insert in here a specific provision which may be in conflict with the provision in the general bridge act. If it is not in conflict, there is no occasion for having it in here at all. If it is in conflict, it may raise a doubt as to who has the authority to fix what a reasonable rate of toll shall be.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think, on the contrary, the specification that no passenger shall pay over 25 cents is simply directory to the Secretary of War and does not divest him of his jurisdiction at all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CLARK of Florida). The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, strike out all of sections 2 and 3.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read: "To authorize Arkansas & Memphis Railway Bridge & Terminal Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River."

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, his motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

STEAMER "WILLIAM A. HAWGOOD."

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 4521) to authorize the change of the name of the steamer William A. Hawgood.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 4521) to authorize the change of the name of the steamer William A. Hawgood.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Navigation is hereby authorized and directed, upon application of the owner, the Calumet Transportation Co., of Mentor, Ohio, to change the name of the steamer William A. Hawgood, official No. 204701, to that of R. L. Agassiz.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER, his motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL FOR THE EXPLORATION OF THE SEA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was H. J. Res. 223, providing for the participation by the United States in the International Council for the Exploration of the Sea.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 223) providing for the participation by the United States in the International Council for the Exploration of the Sea.

Resolved, etc., That the United States shall hereafter participate in the administrative expenses of the permanent International Council for the Exploration of the Sea in the interest of the commercial fisheries.

Resolved further, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be authorized annually to pay the pro rata share of the United States in the administrative expenses of the permanent International Council for the Exploration of the Sea and for the necessary expenses of an expert official representative in attendance at the annual meeting of the council and clerical and other expenses connected with the investigations out of any money which shall be appropriated for these purposes from time to time by Congress.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have somebody explain this bill.

The SPEAKER. Who has charge of this bill?

Mr. SLAYDEN. What is the number?

Mr. MANN. House joint resolution 223. It is reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs and was introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, this joint resolution No. 223, providing for the participation by the United States in the International Council for the Exploration of the Sea, was introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]. I regret that illness prevents him from attendance to-day to explain the matter. All that it does is to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the pro rata share of the United States as a member of the permanent council for the exploration of the sea. It is an important and a meritorious matter. The diplomatic and consular appropriation bill should carry the appropriation for our share every year. However, as there is no law authorizing the appropriation, it is subject to a point of order in the House. It has been recommended over and over again by the State Department. The Secretary of the Treasury sends annually the estimate. The Committee on Foreign Affairs thought it advisable to obviate this anomaly, took up this resolution, gave a hearing, reported it favorably and unanimously, and I indulge the hope that it will pass without objection.

Mr. Speaker, the object of this council to explore the sea is to acquire a thorough knowledge of the commercial fishes of the Atlantic Ocean, to apply that knowledge in the interest of fishing and fishermen, to advise the cooperating Governments in all matters pertaining to the preservation of the fish supply, the development of the fisheries, and fishery legislation. For this purpose the State Department, with the approval of Secretary Nagel, has asked Congress to make a small and fixed annual appropriation.

In this connection Dr. Hugh M. Smith, Deputy Commissioner of the Bureau of Fisheries, states that the important fishery problems that are demanding attention in Europe are almost identical with those which have arisen or are destined to arise on the western shores of the Atlantic; and it will be of great advantage to the United States to be able to participate in and profit directly by the studies conducted by the leading fishery authorities and experts of western Europe. With larger fishery interests at stake than any other country possesses, it would be illogical, Dr. Smith holds, for this country to neglect any opportunity to place those interests on the finest possible basis. The combined knowledge and experience of the world's greatest fishery experts is offered at a nominal cost.

The preservation of the American salmon, the solution of the mystery enveloping the disappearance of the mackerel, and the question of trawl fishing are considered by experts ripe subjects for international cooperation.

There are now 10 countries represented in the council by official delegates with full powers—Great Britain, Germany, Russia, the Netherlands, France, Belgium, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, and Finland. It owes its origin to an invitation extended some years ago by the Swedish Government to the other States interested in the fisheries of the northern European seas to a conference in Stockholm, at which plans should be drawn for the exploration and investigation of the sea in behalf of the fishing industry. Later a conference was held in Christiania, on the invitation of the Norwegian Government, and finally the States represented at these two conferences decided, by the formal votes of their respective parliaments, to enter into the proposed work, and upon the solicitation of the Danish Government the delegates assembled in Copenhagen in 1902, with full power to constitute themselves an international council.

For the elucidation of vital fishery problems that are common to the two sides of the Atlantic the Governments of the United States and Canada have now joined the council.

Each nation participating in this work contributes a certain fixed sum for the administrative and other expenses of the council. The amount which the United States will be required to expend as its share is $7,156, which equals the contributions of Great Britain, Russia, Germany, France, and Holland. The minor powers, Belgium, Sweden, Denmark, and so forth, are assessed for smaller sums.

Dr. Smith states that the council has never indulged in abstruse scientific investigations with no practical object in view, but has always addressed its inquiries to definite economic questions of vital importance to the fishing industry. He detailed some very interesting examples of the work that has already been done in connection with the development of fisheries on the western European coast.

The fishery problems of western Europe are the fishery problems of eastern America. All of the great commercial fishes are identical on the two sides of the ocean—the cod, the haddock, the salmon, and the herring. All the economic questions affecting fishery resources that have arisen in Europe during the past 1,000 years of active fishing will sooner or later arise in America, and some of them are already demanding attention. By careful consideration of the experience of European countries in the handling of troublesome questions involving the preservation of the fishery resources untold trouble and expense can be saved if the American Government only follows the proper methods of investigation, legislation, and administration. By taking advantage of the opportunity afforded by the council representing the European nations this country can be assured of the cooperation of the leading fishery authorities and experts of the day, and can clear up in short order matters that might for a generation hang over and threaten American fishery interests.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman to say that this item was carried in the annual diplomatic appropriation bill. How long has it been carried in that bill?

Mr. SULZER. My impression is once or twice. This is a recent council, and all the European nations and Canada and the United States are members of the council. It does good work in exploring the Atlantic Ocean to find out about the habits of the food fishes. It is a commercial matter of great interest to all the people of the United States, and for the little that we pay every year as a member of this council we get back in material things thousands of dollars for every one expended.

Mr. MANN. Is it not a fact that all of the work that has been done by this council so far in the way of exploration has been done in the North Sea, with which we have no immediate connection?

Mr. FITZGERALD rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] yield to his colleague from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]?

Mr. SULZER. Yes; in a moment. Let me say that the knowledge gained from the council by the bureaus of fisheries, with special regard to the fisheries of the North Atlantic coast, will be very useful in consideration of the welfare of the fisheries of the entire country, and will be especially valuable in the administration of the fisheries of Alaska. The physical and tidal condition of the waters of the northwest coast of the United States are so similar to those of the northwest coast of Europe that the experience of the European nations in administering the fisheries to the best advantage can not fail to be most helpful to the American industry.

The estimates for this appropriation were sent to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the money to pay our share should be carried in the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill. We should pay our share as a member of this international council, and it is a good deal better, in the opinion of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to have a law that will authorize the appropriation than to make the appropriation without authority of law.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman say that we are a member of this international council?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. On what authority is that statement made?

Mr. SULZER. If the gentleman will read the testimony of Dr. Smith before the committee he will find that the Government has been represented in this council.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] is mistaken. The invitation has been extended, but never accepted.

Mr. MANN. What does this mean?

The United States Government has been recently invited, through official channels, to become a party to this international council, and at the annual meeting held in 1910 in Copenhagen the Department of Commerce and Labor was represented.

Mr. SULZER. We were invited to join this international council. We joined. We participated. We get the results. The Government has sent a representative to it. We have appropriated money for its expense—our share up to the present time—and we have taken advantage of all the council has done. The State Department, as the gentleman will see by the letter of Mr. Huntington Wilson, approves this legislation. It says:

The object of the resolution is to give effect to what I have twice recommended in the estimates for foreign intercourse, namely, those for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and, if I may be permitted to do so, I beg to give renewed expression to the favor with which I regard this matter.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman able to state how many of these international bodies we contribute to the support of, all of which are located in foreign lands and none of which is located on American soil?

Mr. SULZER. Very few, I believe. I want to say I do not believe there is one of them that is of such importance to the people generally of the United States as this International Council for the Exploration of the Sea.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is not this the same item that was in the diplomatic and consular bill last year?

Mr. SULZER. It is.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And was thrown out on a point of order?

Mr. SULZER. It went out on a point of order in the House. That is what I am trying to obviate by passing this resolution.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It was thrown out on the objection, I think, of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Harrison].

Mr. SULZER. That I do not know. The record will show.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is one of the kind that were objected to in the same way?

Mr. SULZER. Quite true. We should appropriate money to pay our share. It is only a few thousand dollars every year, and it is worth it, according to the testimony of those most competent to judge.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it a fact that prior to the objection made last year to this item in the diplomatic and consular bill the Government had been participating in these conferences and that appropriations had been made for that purpose?

Mr. SULZER. That is quite true.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What is the appropriation asked for this year?

Mr. SULZER. The appropriation asked for this year is a little over $7,000.

Mr. MANN. We sent representation to the congress once, but we never have become members of the International Council. We have been invited to do so, and so has Canada, but I do not think Canada has accepted the invitation. I shall not object to the resolution, although it is perfectly patent to anyone who gives consideration to these international bodies that they are designed to obtain information for the benefit of foreign countries exclusively. We carry on our own work in these directions, and we give the benefits and results of that work to the world; and having done that we are asked, in addition to that, to contribute to the expense of investigations somewhere else, with which we are not concerned except in a mere scientific way.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me an interruption before he takes his seat?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I understand that we do for ourselves all work of a similar nature, and we are invited to participate in a commission or a convention or an association located in a foreign country from which we derive no benefit?

Mr. MANN. From which we derive no benefit except, possibly, in a scientific way.

Mr. SULZER. We derive much benefit and valuable information from these scientific explorations.

Mr. MANN. They do not make explorations where we are interested. We make our own explorations at our own expense.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then, why should we engage in it?

Mr. MANN. Out of good nature only, I guess.

Mr. SULZER. Let me say to the gentleman that off the coast of North Carolina, off the coast of Virginia, and off the coast of Massachusetts, where great schools of food fish were formerly found, they have disappeared. They do not come there now. Our fishermen do not catch them now. They have gone, for reasons we are trying to find out, to some other part of the Atlantic Ocean.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It may be they have disappeared altogether.

Mr. SULZER. No; they have gone to other places where the food supply for these fish is better, and where, perhaps, the ocean currents are better adapted to their development. The scientists representing all the countries of Europe and North America are trying to find out about the habits of fish. They publish the information they obtain, and the reports are sent to our Government.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It seems to me the important thing is whether that commission is going to propose a plan by which we could persuade those fish to return to the shores of America. [Laughter.]

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. SLAYDEN. How is that proposed to be done?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. We are going to devise a plan by which that can be done. [Laughter.]

Mr. SLAYDEN. If they do not come back; if we do not provide more schools for their instruction and persuade them to return—

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. SULZER. I do.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Is it not a fact that the principality of Monte Carlo is one of the nations participating in this congress?

Mr. SULZER. No.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. The gentleman knows that the Prince of Monte Carlo has been for years engaged in the very laudable project and endeavor of discovering the secrets of the deep?

Mr. MANN. Catching suckers, as I understand it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SLAYDEN. I was just going to suggest that.

Mr. SULZER. This is a serious matter.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. If the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Illinois will only quit laughing long enough for me to ask a question, I will be obliged to them. I wanted to know whether the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs is aware of the fact that this Congress has the benefit of the researches made by the Prince of Monte Carlo?

Mr. SULZER. It has.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. And that is obtained freely, without the principality being one of the nations participating along with the other nations?

Mr. SULZER. I would say to the gentleman from Colorado that is quite true, and that it is most commendable. I will say further to the gentleman from Colorado that the countries that are now parties to this council are Belgium, Denmark, England, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, Scotland, Canada, and the United States.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Now, I will say to the gentleman, in conclusion, that that answers my question, and I now yield back my time to the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman is always very courteous.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to his colleague?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs by whom are the investigations conducted that are determined by this council to be made within the regions designated?

Mr. SULZER. I did not hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. By whom are the investigations conducted that are determined by this council should be made?

Mr. SULZER. On the part of the United States.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; not on the part of the United States. The United States has not made any yet.

Mr. SULZER. The United States is a party to the council.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The United States has not been a party to the council.

Mr. SULZER. Oh, yes; it was represented in the council.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken. The report of the committee shows that an invitation has been extended to the United States, but it has never been a member of the council.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. It had representatives there in 1910.

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Where does the gentleman find that statement?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. That is in the report.

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman from New York will find it in the testimony, before the committee, of Dr. Smith, of the Bureau of Fisheries. We are a party to the council, not by virtue of an authorization by Congress, but by participation and assent, and we appropriate the money for our share. All the Committee on Foreign Affairs wants to do is to put behind the appropriation an authorization, so that it will not be subjected to criticism.

Mr. SLAYDEN. How much of an appropriation is asked for in this bill?

Mr. SULZER. None.

Mr. SLAYDEN. How much will it cost?

Mr. SULZER. It will cost in the neighborhood of six or seven thousand dollars a year.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Why should it be indefinite?

Mr. SULZER. Our share depends on the total expenses. The expenses of the council every year are apportioned among the nations which are parties to the council.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not approve of the idea of making an indefinite appropriation of an undetermined amount.

Mr. SULZER. This resolution merely authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay our share.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not this do it?

Mr. SULZER. No; it simply authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay our share.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is virtually an appropriation.

Mr. SULZER. Some years it may be more and some years it may be less. This year it is about $7,000—

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does it, like all other commissions, show a tendency to grow in cost?

Mr. SULZER. The council does a purely scientific work.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Has it ever been higher in any previous years than it is this?

Mr. SULZER. No.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then it is higher this year than ever before?

Mr. SULZER. About the same. I think the amount asked for this year is the same as last year.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. There was none last year.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It looks to me like bad legislation to appropriate indefinitely.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should like to get some information.

Mr. SULZER. I shall be pleased to give the gentleman the information.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am endeavoring to find out how these investigations are made. Suppose this council should determine that investigations should be made in waters under the control of the United States. How and by whom would such investigations be made?

Mr. SULZER. These investigations are made by scientific men of the countries which are parties to the council.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I should think that ought to satisfy the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. SULZER. The exploration of the sea to find out about fish is a large undertaking, and these men do it along scientific lines in an international way, just as the United States is making investigations about fish for itself in a national way.

Mr. FITZGERALD. These investigations are confined to quite a restricted area.

Mr. SULZER. They take in the northwest Atlantic Ocean.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; the gentleman is mistaken. The investigations extend from the Barents Sea in the north to Morocco in the south, and include the fisheries of the Baltic, off Iceland and Faroe, and on the Rockhall Bank. The United States itself has made appropriations for many years for investigations by the Fish Commission.

Mr. SULZER. I will say to the gentleman—

Mr. FITZGERALD. It has made appropriations for inquiries respecting food fishes, the cause of decrease of food fishes in waters of the United States, investigations and experiments in respect to aquatic animals and plants, and in the interest of fish culture and the fishery industry.

Reading the hearings before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, it appears that the council is a deliberative council, and it determines the scope of the investigations at the annual meeting for the year that is to follow. Suppose it is determined that certain investigations should be made in the waters under the control of the United States, of the Atlantic coast, by whom, by what party or nation would such investigation be made?

Mr. SULZER. It appears in the hearings before the committee, and will appear clear to every Member of the House who looks into the subject matter, that this council is doing a most important scientific work.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman answer my question, because upon that answer depends my attitude toward this measure?

Mr. SULZER. If the gentleman from New York will permit me to conclude, I will answer him. These investigations are made in the most scientific way that is known to-day to man.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Who makes them?

Mr. SULZER. The nations making them that I have mentioned.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Who would make such investigations in the waters of the United States that I have indicated?

Mr. SULZER. I will read for the gentleman's information—

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have read that. The gentleman does not know or will not give the information I ask.

Mr. SULZER. I will read what the Department of Commerce and Labor says.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have read that four times.

Mr. SULZER. If the gentleman has, he does not understand it. I will try to make him understand it. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Now, will my colleague answer the question? I will repeat it: In the event that this council should determine that certain investigations should be made in waters under the control of the United States on our Atlantic coast, by whom would such investigation be made?

Mr. SULZER. They might be made by the United States.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is what I wanted to get at.

Mr. SULZER. If they were within the 3-mile limit of course they would have to be made by the United States, but they might be made by Norway or the Netherlands, or by any other country beyond our jurisdiction.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Has Norway or the Netherlands or any other country any parties at work making investigations of the waters under the control of the United States?

Mr. SULZER. The testimony shows that codfish on the Newfoundland banks are becoming fewer every year. They are the greatest food fish in the world. Great nations have gone to war about the right to take these fish on the Newfoundland banks. This council is investigating the habits of the codfish. We are getting valuable information, and if we are getting it we ought to pay our share. We do pay it, but the Committee on Foreign Affairs want to have this resolution passed so we shall not have to make an appropriation and have it subject to a point of order.

Mr. CURLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. Certainly.

Mr. CURLEY. Is it customary for the food fish to school in any particular place annually? As a matter of fact, is it not the purpose of this commission to so study and become informed as to the habits of the fish as to be able to locate their place of schooling?

Mr. SULZER. That is quite true. The great food fish are migratory. Some seasons they go to one place and some seasons to another place. Some attribute it to one cause and some to another cause. We know very little about the customs of the inhabitants of the ocean, but we are making investigations to find out all we can. It is an economical subject as well as a commercial matter. Fish is becoming more and more a necessary of life. All great nations are making scientific investigations. We have a great seacoast on the Pacific and on the Atlantic. Our people make a great deal of money every year out of fish, not only on the Atlantic but on the Pacific coast and in Alaska, and any information that we can get regarding the habits, the migrations, the supply, and the value as food of these commercial fish is very valuable. It should require no argument to demonstrate the proposition. We are getting information, to a large extent, through the agency of this international council, and we ought to be glad, as a great Nation of 90,000,000 people, to pay our share when it amounts to only about $7,000. I do not believe in being penny-wise and pound-foolish. I know something of the value of food fish to the people.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. I will.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, I subscribe most heartily to all the gentleman's views, agreeing with all that he has said about the propriety of making this appropriation. I wish to ask, in part answer to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], who has asked the question, if it is not in contemplation that if our Government participates in this council, which we have not done in the past and have refused to do, even to the extent of a few thousand dollars a year, that some of our scientists, some of our men who are up in that knowledge, would be a part of that council naturally, and would participate in that investigation.

Mr. SULZER. What the gentleman says about our scientists is true. However, we do participate in the council.

Mr. SHARP. And in further answer to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], who objected to this appropriation because of its lack of definiteness, I wish to ask if it has not been the history of all these expenditures on the part of other Governments that the sum required has averaged less than a thousand dollars for 8 or 10 years past, and that in all probability our share would not exceed $5,000 per year.

Mr. SULZER. About that.

Mr. SHARP. And if in view of the fact that our Government has adjacent to its shores many, many times as many miles of seacoast as any of the other participants, there is any good and just reason why we should not participate in that small share of $5,000 to get this further knowledge.

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman has well stated it, I trust, Mr. Speaker, that my friend from New York will not object to this resolution.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, this report says that this council owes its origin to an invitation extended by the Swedish Government to the other Governments interested in the fisheries of the northern European seas to a conference at Stockholm, at which plans should be drawn for the exploration and investigation of such seas in behalf of the fishing industry; and the investigations so far conducted have been solely designed to benefit those interested in the fishing industries of the northern European seas. The United States under its own Fish Commission conducts all of the investigation necessary and essential in waters under the control of the United States, not only on the Atlantic and on the Pacific but in the waters of Porto Rico, the Hawaiian and the Philippine Islands. It does it at an expense of about $35,000 a year. It is now proposed that we authorize an expenditure of over $7,000 a year to facilitate investigations conducted under the protection of a council which is primarily convened to advance the fishing industry of those engaged in fishing in the northern European seas.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman from New York that I trust he will not object to pass this resolution by unanimous consent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to have my colleague say that to me. I shall exercise my own judgment.

Mr. SULZER. I say so, because I believe it is a matter of the utmost importance to the poor people—to the consumers—of the United States. Every year we will doubtless appropriate the money for our share, whether it is authorized by an act or not, because if it is not put on the appropriation bill in the House it will be put on the bill in the Senate, and the conferees on the part of the House will ultimately yield and support it. The truth about the matter is that if we participate in this council we ought to pay our share. The council is doing a world work in the interest of the consumers. I want to say, and I know whereof I speak, that there is nothing to-day in which the people of the world take a greater interest than in the high cost of the necessities of life. One way to lessen the cost of living is by increasing the supply of food fishes. The price of meat is going up. Meat is becoming scarcer and harder to get for the poor man in this country. Our great cattle ranges in the West are a thing of the past. Our supply of live stock must grow less. We can not raise the beef for export we formerly did. In a few years it will be all we can do to raise enough meat to supply the wants of our own people. Our poor people, like the poor people in other countries, must ere long live more and more on fish. It is the natural law. We can not evade it if we would. Fish are healthful to eat. All scientists say so. The more fish we have the better for our people. We should do all we can to preserve and protect the great food supply for man afforded by the sea. It is one of the necessities of life.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to my colleague the statement that Congress is going to appropriate this money whether it is legal or otherwise is a statement the gentleman will find he will not be able to substantiate.

Mr. SULZER. Well, it has done it, and that is just what I am opposed to and want to avoid by this meritorious legislation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It has not done it in recent years.

Mr. SULZER. It has been done since this council was created.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I desire to say to my colleague, if he imagines that in defiance to the sentiment of this House in the consular and diplomatic bill he can successfully agree to items inserted in the Senate to which the House is opposed he will have a sad awakening before the expiration of this session of Congress. I object to this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules—

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. That can not be done until we get through with call for unanimous consent. The Clerk will report the next bill on the calendar.

PROOF OF DESERT-LAND ENTRIES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 17032) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to grant further extension of time within which to make proof on desert-land entries in the counties of Modoc and Lassen, Cal.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17032) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to grant further extension of time within which to make proof on desert-land entries in the counties of Modoc and Lassen, Cal.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, grant to any entryman who has heretofore made entry under the desert-land laws in the counties of Modoc and Lassen, in the State of California, a further extension of the time within which he is required to make final proof: Provided, That such entryman shall, by his corroborated affidavit filed in the land office of the district where such land is located, show to the satisfaction of the Secretary that because of unavoidable delay in the construction of irrigation works intended to convey water to the land embraced in his entry he is, without fault on his part, unable to make proof of the reclamation and cultivation of said lands as required by law within the time limited therefor; but such extension shall not be granted for a period of more than three years, and this act shall not affect contests initiated for a valid existing reason.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, this is a counterpart of an act of February 28, 1911 (36 Stat., 960), relating to Washington, and a like act passed this year applying to the counties of Weld and Larimer, in the State of Colorado. This bill was taken up before the Public Lands Committee, and after going into the matter they have unanimously reported it after receiving a report from the Acting Secretary of the Interior. The report shows that there are three principal projects in these counties at present, one covering an extent of some 2,000 acres, and another one of about 40,000 acres, and another one for something over 200,000 acres, and they are all private concerns. The last one, known as the Lassen-Willow Creek Water Co., according to a report made July 5, 1911, proposes to irrigate about 200,000 acres, and apparently has sufficient water rights for that purpose. Only about 10 per cent of the project had been completed at that time, and the company was embarrassed for a lack of available funds to prosecute its work. And there is a question of litigation, and the purpose is to give the entryman under these projects, present enterprises, and other entries three years more time in which to complete their reclamation, cultivation, and proof, and the Secretary recognizes it as to these bills.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I think there should be no objection to the passage of this bill, but I think that Congress should go further and pass a general bill on the subject. The necessity for this legislation is apparent. It is also apparent that as time passes and irrigation projects involve greater and greater difficulties it becomes necessary to give the entryman an extension of time within which, in some instances, to apply water to his land. The desert-land law requires proof in 4 years from the date of entry. We passed a law some 2 years ago authorizing the Commissioner of the General Land Office, on a proper showing, to grant an extension of 3 years. The bill before the House provides that a further extension of 3 years can be granted by the Secretary of the Interior, so that the extension herein granted will give these entrymen 10 years from date of original entry within which to make proof, providing they can make a proper showing that through no fault of their own, no lack of effort on their own part, they are unable to irrigate their land. Of course these men must eventually pay the amount due on their lands—that is, the amount due the Government, $1.25 or $2.50 an acre—but they are relieved from the necessity of proving that which under the circumstances they are unable to prove—that they have reclaimed their lands.

Mr. MANN. Does a desert-land entryman have to pay $2.50 an acre for desert land?

Mr. MONDELL. A dollar and a quarter an acre for land not within a railroad-land grant.

Mr. MANN. Where are these lands?

Mr. MONDELL. My understanding was that these were probably within land-grant limits.

I am not certain, however, as to that. I was assuming that they were. The ordinary desert-land entryman pays $1.25 an acre for his land. If he has anything within land-grant limits he pays double the price.

Mr. RAKER. I do not think these come within land-grant limits, I will say to the gentleman. In addition to the $1.25 he has to pay $1 an acre each year for the improvement of that land in the way of getting water, and so forth, for the first three years, and these projects have obtained water rights, and are obtaining them, at the cost of $25 to $50 an acre—that is, when they get it finally paid for after 10 or 20 years' payment they will get a perpetual water right. This is all private enterprise by corporations, associations, and individuals, bringing under reclamation and cultivation land that even the Government believed, under their investigation, could not be so brought. Whenever you can give these private individuals and give private capital an opportunity to go into these barren hills and put in dams and build ditches by which to assist in reclaiming these vast tracts of arid lands they ought to be given sufficient time in which to do it. If any more time should be needed, they ought to have it. The entryman is not really responsible for the misfortunes that may occur. A dam may break, a flume goes out, and in one district they had a tunnel a mile and a half long, and the tunnel caved, and it took a year to build it up, and in that year they were unable to get the water. In another instance the head gate went out. Private individuals are doing all they can, but when they get through and when they make proof to the Government they must show that they have expended this amount of money—that is, $3 per acre for the first three years for the water-right improvements, and so forth—but, as a matter of fact, when they come to prove up and get their water right from the company, an organization or a corporation, they pay from $25 to $50 an inch per acre.

Mr. MANN. Where is the requirement that they have to pay $3 an acre on account of water right?

Mr. RAKER. That is on improvement—cultivation, and so forth. That is in the law to-day. The general land law requires them to expend $1 an acre on the entire tract for the first year, and $1 an acre for the second year, and $1 an acre the third year, and in the fourth year they may prove up.

Mr. MANN. That does not apply in this case, however.

Mr. RAKER. No; not here.

Mr. MANN. It has nothing to do with the case at all. It simply applies to this extent: Having expended that money, having entered into a contract and made preparations for the water, if by any reason they fail, they should not be cut out by a contest, but should be given a sufficient length of time in which to complete the irrigation, reclamation, or cultivation.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I think I can explain the situation to the gentleman. These entrymen have all made their affidavits of the expenditure of $1 an acre per annum for three years for the irrigation of their land.

Mr. RAKER. That is right. They are required to do that the first three years of their entry, and of course they have done it.

Mr. MANN. What have they expended it on?

Mr. MONDELL. They must show that they have either expended that money for the actual construction of irrigation work, in the cultivation of land, or in the purchase of water rights.

Mr. MANN. These people are not constructing irrigation works.

Mr. MONDELL. In this case it is possible they have made that expenditure in the purchase of water rights; that is, they have paid that much to the people who are building irrigation works. The expenditure of $1 an acre per annum must be for purposes tending to the development, cultivation, and the reclamation of the land. That proof has all been presented.

Mr. MANN. What does it mean in the bill, then, that all they need to show is they are unable to make proof of the reclamation and cultivation of said land, as required by law, within the time limited therefor. Is not that for the very purpose of eliminating the requirements that they shall have expended at least $1 an acre on the land?

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will allow me just a moment—

Mr. RAKER. The man may have expended his money, $1 an acre, and still he would have nothing upon which to make final proof. Why? Because he must have actually improved and diverted the water upon the particular tract of land that he desires to prove upon.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a question? All this, to me, is not especially interesting or informing. I would like to know what the process is in reference to these projects. Here is one company that proposes to irrigate 200,000 acres of land. Evidently no one made any desert-land entries upon that land to any considerable extent before the irrigation project was inaugurated.

Mr. RAKER. I will answer the gentleman upon that. In regard to this first one in particular, the Madeline Meadows Land & Irrigation Co.'s holding is a place that I have been over for the last 26 years.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is personally familiar with it?

Mr. RAKER. Yes. It lay idle until within the last seven or nine years. The company has gone in and bought out some water rights and has built a dam and made canals and ditches to bring the water upon what is known as the Madeline Plain, a tract of land about 60 miles long and averaging from 10 to 20 miles broad. It is desert land, without any water on it, covered with sagebrush from a foot and half high to 10 feet high, and some of the sagebrush is at least 6 inches in diameter down at the base. These men entered into a contract with the desert-land entrymen and—

Mr. MANN. Where do the desert-land entrymen come from? They did not go on there in the first place for the purpose of cultivating the soil without any possibility of irrigation, did they?

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman is mistaken about that. As quick as the project is in shape—

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman says that the people in charge of the project sold to the entrymen first.

Mr. RAKER. I do not understand the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. People do not make desert-land entries upon ground of this kind unless they know there is an irrigation project in sight.

Mr. RAKER. A great many of the entrymen are local people and some came from various States. Some of them came from the Eastern States. They came and filed upon that land, but they were unable in the first four years to get the water on the land, owing to the fact that the first year the tunnel gave in, and the next year the head gate could not be used. That is why they got the first extension. Others require more time on their projects. They pay at least $35 an acre for an inch of water. When it is completed that becomes a part of the water right upon their land.

Mr. MANN. Until the tunnels burst again, and the head gate will not work the next time.

Mr. RAKER. It will work if it is only attended to properly.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will allow me, I wish to say that it is not the fault of the entryman that the engineers make a mistake.

Mr. MANN. No; it is not the fault of the entryman if the engineers make a mistake, and therefore I do not object to these extensions; but it is the fault of the Government that permits a lot of entrymen to go on the land where a lot of them may be swindled in the end, in connection with irrigation projects that are not properly conceived and are not properly carried out. I do not know whether or not that is the case in this instance.

Mr. RAKER. It is not in these projects; and good results have been obtained by private individuals in many instances.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman may be correct. It has cost as much as $85 an acre to get the water on the land, but after these men have spent their money on the ground it is only equitable that the Government should give an extension.

I would say to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] that after passing an act like this, which the President signed on the 26th day of January, I received another application similar to this, and I now have a general bill pending, favorably reported by the committee, to allow all entrymen who have made a general entry throughout the United States to have an extension.

Mr. MONDELL. I wonder why the gentleman did not put that on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, so that we could dispose of all these cases at one time and not make a number of bites of the cherry.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I doubted the wisdom of putting it on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, and thus complicate it with the bills on the other calendar. But I hope the relief asked for may be had in this case. I hope the House will act favorably upon this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. RAKER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LOT IN THE CITY OF ALVA, OKLA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 16612) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to convey a certain lot in the city of Alva, Okla.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to convey to Company I, Oklahoma National Guard, the following tract of land, in the city of Alva, Woods County, State of Oklahoma, to wit: Lot No. 19, in block No. 41, according to the original plat thereof.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 4 insert, after the word "I," the words "First Regiment"; and in line 8 strike out the period after the word "thereof" and insert a comma, and add the following words, to wit: "which patent shall be issued upon the express condition that Company I, First Regiment Oklahoma National Guard, must erect an armory building upon said lot within two years after the approval of this act."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I should like to have the gentleman explain the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, this bill refers to a lot in the town of Alva. Alva is a part of a certain tract of land that was opened to settlement in September, 1893. Under the act the Secretary of the Interior or the President was authorized to reserve 320 acres in each county for a county-seat town. Those lots were not sold to settlers, but the entire town site was given away free to settlers. That is, a man who went in there on that day or any subsequent day and took a lot got it free.

It so happened that there was a certain lot which was not taken by any person, and it has remained there from September, 1893, down to the present time—19 years—unoccupied, unused, and unowned except as the title remained in the Government.

In 1896, at the request of the adjutant general of the Territory of Oklahoma, this lot was reserved or set aside for the use of the local militia company for an armory; but we were expecting statehood every year, and it went on from time to time, and the militia company has never gotten title.

The lot is 25 by 140 feet. Under the State law of Oklahoma the local militia company is authorized to acquire title to real property for the purpose of constructing an armory.

This bill has been recommended by the Secretary of the Interior. He raises no objection to the passage of it. The lot is a small one. The bill provides that a suitable armory shall be constructed, which will probably cost two or three thousand dollars. I think there ought to be no objection to the bill.

Mr. MANN. I see the committee have recommended an amendment to the bill providing that the patent shall be issued upon the express condition that an armory building shall be erected upon the lot within two years after the approval of the act. Supposing an armory building be not erected, then who has the title?

Mr. MORGAN. It remains with the Government, of course.

Mr. MANN. Not at all. That is just where it does not remain. The Government passes the title by patent. The title goes to the patentee upon a condition subsequent, and if the armory should not be erected within two years it would take legal action to determine where the title rested and who had the title. It would tie up the title to the property so that nobody could do anything with it.

Mr. NORRIS. It is tied up now.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. I should like to state that the words "upon the express condition" appear to me, under the holding of our Supreme Court, to mean that if the condition is not complied with within that time the title reverts to the original owner.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. The title never reverts on a condition subsequent in a deed, except upon some action taken.

Mr. RAKER. There is a difference of opinion on that.

Mr. MANN. Here is a proposition to make a patent of the land on a condition subsequent. The Government might have the right to commence legal proceedings to obtain title. If the purpose of the amendment is to have the title revert to the Government, it is a very simple proposition to fix it so that it shall. I do not desire to insist upon a proposition of that sort, although I have prepared an amendment which would settle that thing.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman offer his amendment?

Mr. MANN. My amendment reads as follows:

Provided, however, That if said armory building shall not be erected on said lot at the time specified, or if at any time thereafter said lot shall cease to be used as a site for the armory building, the title to said lot shall, without further action, revert to and be in the United States.

Now, I understand from the gentleman from Oklahoma that he has some objection to that part of the amendment which provides that if at any time thereafter the lot shall cease to be used for an armory building the title shall revert, that it might prevent the borrowing of any money for the erection of the building.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. May I inquire of my colleague, or the gentleman from Oklahoma, if the armory building is to be built by the State or by private parties?

Mr. MANN. It is not to be built by the State.

Mr. MORGAN. It is to be built by a local organization.

Mr. MANN. By a local company of militia.

Mr. MORGAN. The militia company is incorporated under a State law, and is authorized to acquire title to land upon which to build an armory.

Mr. MANN. Of course, the company might disband at any time. That was what I had in mind, but I do not care so much about that. I would like to inquire, however, of the gentleman from Oklahoma how much this property is worth.

Mr. MORGAN. I think it would be worth $300 or $400.

Mr. MANN. Is it not worth more than that?

Mr. MORGAN. I have given the gentleman my best judgment.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. How large a town is this?

Mr. MORGAN. A town of about 4,000 people. It is the county seat, but this is not a first-class lot.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Is it in the center of the town?

Mr. MORGAN. It is on one side of the business part of the town, not in the business center, but near the edge of the business part, if I am correctly informed.

Mr. MANN. How much did people there pay for their lots?

Mr. MORGAN. Every single lot was given away by the Government of the United States to individuals. Individuals went in there and some of them got a lot worth $2,000 or more the moment they put their foot on it.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think it is about time that some of these people contributed to buy something from the Government?

Mr. MORGAN. I think if the Government could give lots to individuals, for a much greater reason it should be liberal in donating to a local company of militia. I do not see how there can be any objection to it.

Mr. MANN. This is a bona fide company of militia, is it not?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that?

Mr. MORGAN. I am well acquainted with a good many of the men active in it, and they have been after this for a good many years.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will modify my amendment and have the title revert if the building is not erected.

Mr. MORGAN. That will be perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Would it not be proper to provide that they should pay back the value of the lot if they fail to use it?

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman from Oklahoma may be correct in assuming that these people who are to construct the armory will have to borrow money. Of course, they could not borrow money where the mortgagee, if he foreclosed, would lose the title to the land. A man would not be apt to lend money on security which, if he enforced his claim on the security, he would lose it.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. This would only require the payment back of the appraised value of the lot.

Mr. MANN. I am frank to say that I feel a little bit different in regard to the National Guard as far as the Government is concerned. Now, I will withdraw my right to object and offer the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. Wilson of Pennsylvania). The first question is on the first committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 4 insert after the word "I" the words "first regiment."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois to the second committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee amendment is as follows:

"Page 1, line 8, strike out the period after the word 'thereof' and insert a comma and add the following words, to wit: 'which patent shall be issued upon the express condition that Company L, First Regiment Oklahoma National Guard, must erect an armory building upon said lot within two years after the approval of this act.'"

And the amendment to this amendment offered by Mr. MANN is as follows:

Amend the amendment by inserting after the word "act," line 11, the following: "Provided, That if said armory building shall not be erected on said lot within the time specified the title to said lot shall thereupon without further action revert to and be in the United States."

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment in line 9. Would it be proper to offer that now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, it is necessary, and I think the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] desires to ask unanimous consent to change the name of the company. In the main text of the bill in line 4 it is Company I and in the committee amendment in line 9 it is designated Company L. That undoubtedly ought to be changed.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to amend, in line 9, by striking out "L" and inserting "I."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to amend the amendment by striking out "L" and inserting "I." Is there objection?

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. AKIN of New York. I hope the gentleman will notice the fact that I have not held him up.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Do I understand that this proposes to convey to a company of the National Guard certain real estate?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this company is incorporated?

Mr. MORGAN. Under the laws of Oklahoma the local military companies are specifically authorized to acquire title to real estate and construct an armory.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Does the law provide how they shall convey real estate?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. What would happen in this instance if this company mustered out and disbanded and subsequently another company were formed as a part of this regiment and designated Company I?

Mr. MORGAN. I think the State law provides for the taking over by the State of the property held by the local company.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Does the gentleman know whether it does or not?

Mr. MORGAN. That is my understanding. That is what I have been informed.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It is an unusual situation, it seems to me. I am not aware of any laws generally that would authorize militia companies to own and convey real estate as a company.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, it is the law there.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MORGAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CONVICT-MADE GOODS IN INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 5601) to limit the effect of the regulation of interstate commerce between the States in goods, wares, and merchandise wholly or in part manufactured by convict labor, or in any prison or reformatory.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured wholly or in part by convict labor, or in any prison or reformatory, transported into any State or Territory or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage, shall, upon arrival and delivery in such State or Territory, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory to the same extent and in the same manner as though such goods, wares, and merchandise had been manufactured in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced in original packages or otherwise.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill whether the committee in reporting this bill has taken into consideration the constitutional question involved as to how far Congress has the power, when goods pass from one State to another, remaining in original packages, to make those goods subject to the police laws of the State into which they go—a question that has been in controversy here for a great many years, and upon which very learned opinions have been given by many distinguished men, and upon which hearings have been held that would fill volumes?

Mr. HENSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I will say in answer to that question that the committee did not take up that question and consider it carefully and seriously, but as a member of the committee whose duty it was to prepare the report, I took the necessary time and pains to look over the law, and I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that I think there is no question along that line. I have one decision here that I read very carefully—the case of Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., 23).

Mr. MANN. That is a long time ago, and a great many of us have read that case. I doubt if there is a man in the House who has not.

Mr. HENSLEY. Yes; it is a long time ago, but if it was good, sound ruling at that time by Chief Justice Marshall it should be good now.

Mr. MANN. Yes, but it did not decide this question, or have anything to do with it, in my judgment. Is the gentleman familiar with the very elaborate opinion of the Senate Judiciary Committee on this subject, and the very elaborate hearings held by the House Committee on the Judiciary upon this subject, not as related to convict goods, but as related to the power of Congress to establish the status of goods passing from one State to another remaining in the original packages, so as to make the police laws of the second State apply the moment the goods came across the boundary line?

Mr. HENSLEY. I will say in answer to the gentleman from Illinois, in my candid judgment, when the Federal authorities undertake to invade the province of a State it is very hard to prevent it, and on that proposition I have concluded that this law, if it passes Congress, will tend to strengthen the arm of the State, and it is beyond question a meritorious bill, and the State should have that authority—

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman familiar with the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States on the law we passed with reference to the transportation of liquor from one State to another?

Mr. HENSLEY. I will confess I have not made an exhaustive research on all points that bear upon this question; I will confess that.

Mr. MANN. Of course the gentleman wants to pass a constitutional law on this subject. Some years ago Congress passed a law which was designed to do precisely what he is now seeking to do in reference to interstate shipments of liquor, and when that law came before the Supreme Court it was held unconstitutional, and that law was passed 20 years ago or more, and ever since that time, ever since I have been a Member of the House, I have watched the controversy raging around this proposition as how far Congress has the power to do this, and any bill that is passed ought to be passed in such a way it will have a valid effect.

Mr. HENSLEY. That is very true. Let me inquire of the gentleman from Illinois his opinion with reference to that proposition.

Mr. MANN. Well, I have given a good deal of study—

Mr. HENSLEY. I am satisfied of that.

Mr. MANN. To matters of interstate commerce, and I have never arrived at an opinion on that proposition.

Mr. HENSLEY. I will submit, then, it could hardly be expected in my short experience as a Member of this House that I should be able to give to the gentleman such information as will clarify this question and demonstrate the proposition in that regard.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt there are ways of passing laws that will be effective, but it is desirable in preparing a bill to take those questions into consideration so that the bill that is passed and becomes a law will be of some effect.

Mr. HENSLEY. I will say to the gentleman we took that into consideration, and now when the gentleman from Illinois, after having made a careful study of this question for a period covering several years, is undecided with reference to whether the courts will sustain this law, then why not pass the matter up to the courts and let them pass upon its constitutionality?

Mr. MANN. That is always an easy thing to do. I have been a member of a committee for several years that has never reported a bill that passed the Congress and became a law that has not been sustained by the courts, and they have passed more bills than any other committee of this House here or the other House. They have always considered the constitutional question and never gone on the basis we do not know whether this bill is constitutional or not, but let us pass it and let the courts determine it. We endeavored to determine it for ourselves and tried to arrive at a constitutional bill and have always been successful so far.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say for the information of the gentleman that the committee from which this bill comes took into consideration the question of whether it was constitutional, and the members of the committee satisfied themselves that it was constitutional. We believe that all power of government is lodged somewhere, either in the Federal Government or in the State governments, as the case may be, and that if the power proposed to be exercised has not been conveyed to the Federal Government it would then be in the respective States. The fact that this power can not be exercised by the respective States, and they have been unable to exercise it, we considered to be conclusive evidence that it must be lodged in the Federal Government and so we have sought to exercise that power through this bill.

Mr. MANN. I think it is very evident that my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania has not given this subject consideration from a constitutional viewpoint in view of the decisions of the court on the subject.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not a fact this bill was before some committee at the last session of Congress and taken up and acted upon?

Mr. MANN. This bill has been before various committees. A bill like this has been before the Labor Committee, before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and, I think, has been before the Committee on the Judiciary and several other committees of the House, which for years, in connection with this proposition and in connection with the shipment-of-liquor proposition, have been endeavoring to find a constitutional bill which, when enacted, would be held valid.

Mr. RAKER. The question I am trying to present is this, that the same bill, identical in form to this one, is one that was before the former Congresses. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois and to the gentleman representing the bill, that the best constitutional lawyers we have in my State have informed me that this bill in their view is constitutional. Not only that, but the people seem to be in favor of it. It is a bill that ought to pass.

The question ought to be determined, and if there is any doubt, instead of letting it be buffeted around from committee to committee year in and year out, let the Congress pass it, and let the constitutionality of it be determined by the courts if there is so much difference between the lawyers. I hope there will be no objection to the present consideration of this bill and that it will pass. It ought to become a law.

Mr. MANN. Suppose that I should propose a bill here to prohibit the transportation of red oranges from California into Nevada, if Nevada did not want them? Does the gentleman think that would be a constitutional question?

Mr. RAKER. That is not parallel.

Mr. MANN. That is exactly parallel. There is no distinction whatever.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. RAKER. I want to answer the question as to the red oranges. Nobody would ever object to a California orange at any place.

Mr. MANN. That would depend on whether they have ever eaten Florida oranges or not. [Laughter.] If not, possibly they would take California oranges.

Mr. RAKER. Not on your life. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY]?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MURRAY. I notice the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has not said he believes this bill to be unconstitutional. May I ask him whether or not he believes it is unconstitutional?

Mr. MANN. I answered that question a moment ago.

Mr. MURRAY. You did not answer it any more than you are answering it now.

Mr. MANN. I answered the question a moment ago. The trouble with the gentleman is that he was not paying attention, as he should have done.

Mr. MURRAY. I think the RECORD will show that he said that in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, when he was there, they never put things out and had their constitutionality determined afterwards. And in answer to the gentleman from Missouri he said he had given a great deal of study—

Mr. MANN. The gentleman need not, parrotlike, quote me—

Mr. MURRAY. Did you give an opinion as to the constitutionality of the bill?

Mr. MANN. I stated to the gentleman a while ago, and if the gentleman had been listening he would have heard me—although I am willing to repeat it again—I have never formed an opinion as to whether this provision was constitutional or not. The matter has not been a ripe, active question before the committee. It has been before the Judiciary Committee of both the House and the Senate. I know it is very easy for a lawyer of California to give a street opinion or for a lawyer of some other State to give a street opinion, that an act is constitutional or not constitutional. And yet the trouble is those gentlemen do not manage to get into the House or into the Senate, and then get on the Judiciary Committee, in order to determine the question, or do not usually manage to get on the bench, where they have a chance to determine those questions.

Mr. MURRAY. I find that we are in entire accord as to the value of the wisdom of some lawyer, but I would like to find out for my own information, and in all sincerity, because I respect the opinion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] on such propositions, whether his objections to this measure are because of unconstitutionality or because he is hiding behind the question of unconstitutionality.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am not like the gentleman from Massachusetts. I do not hide behind anything. I would not even hide behind the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MURRAY. You would not if the gentleman from Massachusetts could keep out of the way.

Mr. MANN. It would be impossible either physically or mentally to hide behind him.

Mr. MURRAY. I agree as to both propositions, Mr. Speaker, and I simply want to say that I never knew the gentleman to hide before, and I never knew him on any previous occasion during the limited time that I have been in the House to use the tactics that he seems to be trying to use on this particular bill.

Mr. MANN. I am calling the attention of the House to a serious proposition. Possibly it does not seem so to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY]. He disposes of constitutional questions like a boy does with dust. It is easy for him to settle a constitutional question, picking it up in one hand and tossing it into the air and catching it again in the other hand without the least trouble—

Mr. MURRAY. May I suggest, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MANN. But it is not easy for Members of Congress to decide these questions in that way. The Committee on the Judiciary has this question pending before it now, and other committees have had it pending before them.

Mr. HENSLEY. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HENSLEY] has the floor.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. HENSLEY. Just in one moment; then I will yield to the gentleman. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that I am aware that his question was not propounded with any degree of frivolity, or anything of that sort. It is important that this matter should be discussed. I was interested in finding out whether or not he had come to a conclusion as to the constitutionality of this proposed law. The reason I asked that question was because I believed that if the gentleman had given such study to this question as I have observed he usually does, he could give us an opinion.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, I would say that I have read the reports of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary—

Mr. HENSLEY. I say this not in a spirit of criticism at all—

Mr. MANN. And the statements of different members of the committee, both their expressions when the bill was reported in the Senate and their expressions in speeches in reference to this matter in the Senate, where it has received more consideration than it has received in the House. I have also read the hearings in the House, and have read therein the statements of eminent gentlemen appearing before the House Committee on the Judiciary and the opinions interlarded through the hearings of members of the House Committee on the Judiciary. It may be easy for some gentlemen to determine constitutional questions like this, but—

Mr. HENSLEY. I am not complaining as to the attitude of the gentleman—

Mr. MANN. But I have never had occasion to attempt to determine it, either in committee or otherwise.

Mr. HENSLEY. That is satisfactory.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman's committee took this into consideration, that is all right. That is the question I asked—whether they had reported this bill after studying the constitutional questions.

If I had my way about it I would not let convict-made goods be sold anywhere in competition with free-made goods, but this question goes far beyond the mere transportation of convict-made goods, because if you have the power under the Constitution to declare that one kind of goods shall be subject to one set of laws in one State and subject to another set of laws in another State, and subject to still another set of laws in another State, the moment you cross the boundary line, you have the power under the Constitution also to say that about any kind of commerce that is in existence or can be produced in the United States and the transportation of any goods. Supposing the gentleman's State of Missouri should pass a law declaring that red apples should not be used in commerce in his State. Would Congress have the power then to subject red apples to the application of that law?

Mr. HENSLEY. When it reached the State of Missouri?

Mr. MANN. The moment it passed the boundary line.

Mr. HENSLEY. The moment it reached the State of Missouri—

Mr. MANN. The moment it got beyond the boundary line in the original package, in the car.

Mr. HENSLEY. I have not a doubt as to that.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will examine the opinions on the subject he will have some doubt on the subject, I would say, at least.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HENSLEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I ask—

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, who has the floor?

Mr. HENSLEY. I yielded to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], who wanted to ask a question, as I understand it. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HENSLEY] has the floor.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration of the bill. I think this debate has gone on far enough to show that the bill is too important to be considered under this calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] objects.

STEAMER "SALT LAKE CITY."

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 4728) to authorize the change of name of the steamer Salt Lake City.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Navigation is hereby authorized and directed, upon application of the owner, the Continental Steamship Co., of Duluth, Minn., to change the name of the steamer Salt Lake City, official No. 204526.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. JONES). Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LANDS OF CREEK INDIANS IN ALABAMA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 16661) to relinquish, release, remise, and quitclaim all right, title, and interest of the United States of America in and to all the lands held under claim or color of title by individuals or private ownership or municipal ownership situated in the State of Alabama which were reserved, retained, or set apart to or for the Creek Tribe or Nation of Indians under or by virtue of the treaty entered into between the United States of America and the Creek Tribe or Nation of Indians on March 24, 1832.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States of America hereby forever relinquish, release, remise, and quitclaim all right, title, and interest in and to all the lands now held under claim or color of title by individuals or private ownership or municipal ownership and situated in the State of Alabama which were reserved, retained, or set apart to or for the Creek Tribe or Nation of Indians, or any member or members thereof, under or by virtue of the treaty entered into between the United States of America and the Creek Tribe or Nation of Indians at Washington on the 24th day of March, 1832, by which all the lands of the said Creek Tribe or Nation of Indians lying east of the Mississippi River were ceded to the United States of America, as well as all lands so situated in the State of Alabama which may have been sold by the United States of America or under authority of the same for the benefit of or on behalf of any Creek Indian or Indians, whether the conditions of such reservation or sales were complied with or not and whether or not patents were issued therefor by the United States of America.

The purpose and intent of this act is to estop the United States of America from now or hereafter asserting any claim whatever to the lands now held under claim or color of title by individuals or private ownership or municipal ownership and situated in the State of Alabama which were reserved or set apart under the said treaty to or for the Creek Tribe or Nation of Indians, or any member or members thereof, in any manner or upon any condition whatever, as well as all lands so situated in the State of Alabama which may have been sold by the United States of America or under authority of the same for the benefit of or on behalf of any Creek Indian or Indians, whether patents were issued therefor or not.

With the following committee amendment:

Insert at the end of the bill the following:

"The true intent of this act is hereby declared to be to concede and abandon all right, title, and interest of the United States to those persons, estates, firms, or corporations who would be the true and lawful owners of said lands under the laws of Alabama, including the laws of prescription, in the absence of said interest, title, and estate of the said United States.

"That as to all of the lands reserved for the Creek Indians under said treaty of March 24, 1832, which have not been patented, the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall cause to be made upon the records of their respective offices proper notations referring to this act and closing the cases."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to hear a statement from the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, what statement is it that the gentleman would like to have made?

Mr. MONDELL. This is a highly important piece of legislation. It refers to the title to many tracts of land, and I think the House is entitled to an explanation.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I think I apprehend what the gentleman desires, but I pay the gentleman the compliment—and I do it sincerely—of saying I believe that the gentleman who has propounded the question to me understands this matter perhaps better than I do, for he is a distinguished member of the Committee on the Public Lands; he has had long service here, and he has recently given patient and extensive hearings to different people who have spoken on this subject before his committee.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that my colleagues from Alabama and myself are indebted to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] for some valuable suggestions made by him during the course of the hearings before the committee on this particular bill.

By the first section of the treaty of 1832 concluded between the United States and those Indians described as the Creek Nation or tribe of Indians all lands belonging to the Creek Indians east of the Mississippi River were ceded by them to the United States. Under further provisions of that act the chiefs of that tribe were permitted to select a section of land each for reservation. The heads of families were permitted to select each a half section of land, and then certain sections were reserved for the benefit of the orphans.

This treaty was concluded in 1832. The fact that the Indians had ceded the title to the land was recognized by the act of Congress of March 3, 1837. Then, in 1856, by treaty, it was agreed that the reservations made for the benefit of the Indians should, on certain conditions, be sold, and it was further provided that all of these reservations remaining unsold should be sold by the United States for the benefit of the Indians.

So by treaty and by legislation the Creek Indians have been divested of all title to these lands, which have long since passed into the possession of bona fide and innocent holders.

They embrace something over 990 tracts of land, containing between 2,000,000 and 3,000,000 acres. For 990 of these tracts of land the Secretary of the Interior has said there is no doubt that patents ought to issue. These people and their predecessors in chain of title have been for 70 years, and in some cases longer, in undisturbed possession, without any patents, and have never dreamed that there was any defect in their title until recently, and many of them do not now know of this defect in their title. They have held these lands with the knowledge of the Interior Department, with the knowledge of the Department of Justice, with the knowledge of the Indians, with the knowledge of the whole world all these years.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. I observe that the Government has brought suit.

Mr. CLAYTON. I was coming to that.

Mr. COOPER. How came the Government to bring that suit?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I say that these people have been in the undisturbed, notorious, bona fide, adverse possession of these lands under color of title for 70 years. Several years ago a former district attorney down in Alabama discovered that patents in these cases had never been issued by the United States to the original purchasers, although the sales were made and possession was taken under these sales, and occupancy has continued ever since.

But he discovered that the title not having been issued in the form of a patent from the United States, there was that technical inherent defect in the original title. He also knew, as we all know, that the statute of limitations in Alabama that runs against everybody could not run against the Government of the United States. The technical title was and is vested in the United States. It may be that the United States had title without the treaty of 1832, but with the treaty of 1832 the United States certainly had it. In these cases these people who own and occupy the lands and their predecessors in such ownership and occupancy have never asked for the patents.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is it not a fact that these people, or the ones through whom they derived title, did pay for these lands either the Government or the Indians?

Mr. CLAYTON. Undoubtedly, and here is the report from the department transmitted to me showing that these lands have been paid for, as the gentleman has said, and that there is no objection now to the issuing of these patents. When that question was suggested that a patent had not been issued in this case the Secretary of the Interior, in 1907, Mr. Garfield, called the attention of Congress to the matter. These lands had not been listed on the books of the Interior Department or left open to public entry or for sale by the Government of the United States. The Government has not asserted any claim to them, but the Secretary of the Interior suggested that some legislation ought to be had to clear this matter up.

Still nothing was done until a few months ago the present district attorney in the middle district of Alabama instituted an action of ejectment for the recovery of one of these tracts of land. Then it was made manifest that if it became the policy of the Department of Justice, in cooperation with the Department of the Interior, to institute actions for the recovery of these lands it would be necessary for Congress to afford this relief.

Now, in these cases which are in the list, 990 cases, patents can issue now, but you will have to make certain proofs, and in many of the counties the records of the purchasers showing that they bought these lands have been destroyed, and they can not trace the chain of title back to the original vendor, whether Indian or the United States, at public sale as provided for in the act of Congress.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. Is it not a fact that in 1838, shortly following the transfer of these lands by the Indians to the purchasers, Congress passed an act authorizing patents to issue to bona fide transferees of the reservation, provided they would adduce satisfactory proof to the commissioner of the foreclosure or of the transfer, which, of course, could not be complied with now?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; but it is not possible now in many cases for these bona fide transferees to furnish the proof required by the act of Congress three-quarters of a century ago.

Mr. MANN. And at that time it was not complied with, because people thought that a patent was not necessary and there was no use in going to the expense of it.

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; and these good people have been living there and cultivating these lands and exercising all the rights of ownership over them for 70 years or more. In the hearings before the committee in 990 cases the representative of the Indians, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the representative of the Interior Department said there could be no objection to this legislation.

My attention has been called to the fact that several years ago Congress passed a bill similar to this. This part of the amendment suggested by the committee is taken from that bill. The lands in that case were not Creek Indian lands. The following is the language and the part of the amendment which I have just referred to:

The true intent of this act is hereby declared to be to concede and abandon all right, title, and interest of the United States to those persons, estates, firms, or corporations who would be the true and lawful owners of said lands under the laws of Alabama, including the laws of prescription, in the absence of said interest, title, and estate of the said United States.

This bill is in the nature of a bill to quiet title. We can not interpose a bill of equity against the United States to quiet title. The only remedy we have is to appeal to Congress for this act.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. I would like to inquire if these various persons who are in possession of these lands are there under a deed or color of title, and whether or not they have kept the taxes paid up?

Mr. CLAYTON. Undoubtedly. They have been in possession of these lands for all these years, paying taxes—State, county, and every other sort of tax that could be demanded upon land. This land has never been treated in all these years as a part of the public domain. I can say, furthermore, that in Alabama the title of the owners would be perfect but for this technical title on the part of the United States, because our statute of limitations is to the effect that if a man has been in adverse possession of land for 10 years under color of title he thereby acquires a good title.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. Are the lands held by individuals or corporations?

Mr. CLAYTON. By individuals; and in some cases, I am told, some of our municipalities have been built upon them, and churches and schools have been built upon them.

Mr. CANNON. Who would be the grantees in these patents?

Mr. CLAYTON. There is no specific grantee named.

Mr. MANN. There is no patent in this bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. There is no patent in this bill. It is simply to relinquish all claim of the Government of the United States.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. If he has concluded his statement, I should like to make one myself.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have not concluded any statement. I was simply endeavoring to answer what the gentleman himself had said.

Mr. MONDELL. I should like to make a brief statement myself.

Mr. CLAYTON. Surely. I yield the gentleman all the time he desires.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, whatever I had in mind when I reserved the right to object, I could not have it in my heart now to offer any serious objection to this legislation after the compliment paid me by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

Mr. CLAYTON. A deserved one, however. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. That makes it still more binding. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, however, that while this bill was unanimously reported from the committee of which I am a member, I did reserve the right to object, not to what it is proposed to accomplish, but to the form in which the bill accomplishes the relinquishment of Federal title. I am rather surprised and somewhat gratified that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] for the first time, so far as I can recollect, in all of his very valuable service here has not called attention or objected to the fact that the reports and recommendations of the department of the Government called upon to report are not contained in the report of the committee.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I fear this was an oversight on his part. I shall be very glad to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Finding there was no such report from the department in the committee of the House, I went and got a copy of the report of the department made to a committee of the Senate upon a similar bill.

Mr. MONDELL. I felt confident that the gentleman would insist on having a report from the department on the matter before it was considered, and what surprises me is that he does not now insist that Congress shall follow the recommendation of the department.

Mr. MANN. I will say that I do not insist that Congress shall follow the recommendation of the department.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. I would like to have the gentleman from Illinois tell wherein this bill now before the House does not agree with the recommendations of the Department of the Interior.

Mr. MANN. Oh, it agrees, so far as the substance is concerned.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, this might have been a very simple matter, and I will not detain the House long. There are nearly a thousand tracts of land affected by this legislation. As to all of those tracts, with the exception of about 20, I think the department has all of the evidence required by the original law and it would not require any legislation at all; it has not required any legislation to have patent issued to these tracts. The department, in my opinion, has always had full authority to issue these patents, with the exception of, perhaps, 20 cases, where they are not fully convinced as to the evidence of the payment of a valuable consideration. If legislation were necessary, all that would have been required would be to introduce a bill of three or four lines instructing the Secretary of the Interior to proceed forthwith to issue patents in conformity with the original legislation.

That would have given the claimants a clear record title. Now, of course, I do not know how they view these things in Alabama. They are not as familiar with Government patents there perhaps as we are in the West, but if these tracts were in my State or anywhere in the western country the people would insist on having a patent issued.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit a question right there?

Mr. MONDELL. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. COOPER. I observe in the bill suggested by the Interior Department there is this proviso. I have just read it; never saw it before until the gentleman from Illinois presented it to me:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be held to affect the title of the original Indian owners or their heirs.

Mr. CLAYTON. They ceded what title they had in these lands.

Mr. COOPER. Then, why did the Interior Department insert that proviso in their bill?

Mr. CLAYTON. I have no objection to that, but it is wholly unnecessary. The land was ceded away by the Indians.

Mr. COOPER. It evidently meant something.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think some law clerk somewhere suggested that.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me, in reply to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. This bill does not purport to convey title; it only purports to release title of the United States to the grant.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is all.

Mr. MANN. The other form of the bill was providing for a conveyance of patent. If that were done, it proposed to reserve the rights of the Indians; but this does not affect any of the rights of the Indians—

Mr. MONDELL. Let me say further—

Mr. COOPER. One moment, if the gentleman will permit. I notice that the last clause of the amendment suggested by the committee, page 3, is as follows:

That as to all of the lands reserved for the Creek Indians under said treaty of March 24, 1832, which have not been patented, the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall cause to be made upon the records of their respective offices proper notations referring to this act and closing the cases.

Mr. CLAYTON. I will explain that to the gentleman, if I may.

Mr. COOPER. Does not that relate to issuing a patent?

Mr. CLAYTON. No; it is to take them off the books, and is what is called closing the case. That is the language of the General Land Office. And I will say, if I may be permitted to do so, that the suggestion was made by an official in the Land Office, in his statement before the Public Lands Committee of the House, that the language quoted by the gentleman from Wisconsin be made a part of the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the Secretary of the Interior had it in mind that the suggestion referred to by the gentleman from Wisconsin was at all important it could only be true in regard to about 20 cases out of a thousand.

Mr. CLAYTON. Fourteen, to be accurate.

Mr. MONDELL. Fourteen out of nearly a thousand. All the other cases are made up and are in proper form for patent now.

Mr. COOPER. Let me ask the gentleman—

Mr. MONDELL. And what I can not understand is why they have not heretofore patented those tracts.

Mr. COOPER. They can not.

Mr. MONDELL. They can patent them; there has never been a moment of time since the passage of that act after the cases were made up that they could not have been patented.

Mr. MANN. It would require an affidavit or other evidence showing that the transfer was made in good faith upon a fair consideration in the first place.

Mr. MONDELL. They have affidavits for all but 14 cases now.

Mr. COOPER. Is there any danger by this legislation that an injustice will be done to anybody in those 14 cases?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think there is the slightest possibility of anything of the kind occurring, and the only objection to the legislation is that it does not give the people in Alabama the kind of title I think they ought to have, although it gives them a title the gentleman from Alabama thinks is all sufficient, but I am perfectly willing—

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the gentleman, right in that connection, let me say why we think it is sufficient?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman did explain. I simply want to make my statement, and I will be through in a moment.

Mr. CLAYTON. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MONDELL. I defer to the opinion of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and, while as a layman, I claim no such knowledge of the law as he has, in my humble opinion the people in Alabama will not, in all cases, find the kind of title which this bill gives them entirely satisfactory. I fear it will lead to litigation. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] thinks it will not. But I object to it because it departs from the uniform practice under our land laws of the issuance of a patent to the original purchaser from the Government, in order that there may be a clear title of record. The last provision, which was referred to by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], is simply a provision for clearing these cases from the record, and, of course, it is necessary because without that sort of a provision the cases might remain on the records of the department indefinitely as though they had not been closed. So there is no objection to the intent of the legislation, but I think there is reasonable ground for objection to the form of the legislation. But, as it applies to the State of Alabama, if the gentleman is satisfied with it I am satisfied with it, and, Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the passage of the bill. I do desire to make it clear, however, that as a member of the committee which reported the bill I think the form is faulty, that it should provide for the issuance of patents and not for a quitclaim on the part of the Government.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

The true intent of this act is hereby declared to be to concede and abandon all right, title, and interest of the United States to those persons, estates, firms, or corporations who would be the true and lawful owners of said lands under the laws of Alabama, including the laws of prescription, in the absence of said interest, title, and estate of the said United States.

That as to all of the lands reserved for the Creek Indians under said treaty of March 24, 1832, which have not been patented, the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall cause to be made upon the records of their respective offices proper notations referring to this act and closing the cases.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, this bill comes from the Committee on the Public Lands, I may say, with a unanimous report. It relates solely to lands situated within the State of Alabama, and the purpose of the bill is simply to quiet the title to these lands in so far as the United States is concerned. It does not attempt to convey any title to anyone, but simply releases whatever title the United States may have. Undoubtedly, under the treaty of March 24, 1832, together with the act of March 3, 1837, and the treaty of 1856, these lands were ceded and relinquished by the Creek Nation, or tribe, of Indians to the United States. But, whether this be true or not, this act of relinquishment by the Government of the United States could not in anywise affect any title, if there be such, remaining in the Indians. There are, as I am informed, about 300,000 acres of land involved. The Government of the United States has only a bare legal title to the land by reason of the failure of the original bona fide purchasers of it to apply for and obtain patents. The land has been occupied for many years in good faith, and the purchase price is shown to have been paid by the original purchasers. These purchases occurred somewhere in the neighborhood of 70 years ago, and during all these years the land has been, for the most part, in the open and notorious possession of different citizens of Alabama, who never dreamed that there remained any technical legal title in the United States. During these years taxes have been paid upon the same and they have not been treated as subject to homestead entry nor at any time as part of the public domain.

Of the 990 cases for which no patents have been issued, representatives of the Indian Office inform the Public Lands Committee that in all cases, except perhaps 14, patents could now issue but for the act of March 3, 1837, requiring proof of the bona fides of the different transfers and assignments, which would be an impossibility, at least in many cases, after the lapse of so long a period of time.

It has been suggested that instead of the bill recommended by the committee Congress should adopt an act requiring the Commissioner of the Land Office to issue patents to the original purchasers in all cases where the records show the bona fides of the purchase and payment of the purchase money. My colleagues from Alabama, Mr. CLAYTON, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. BLACKMON, and I, after thoroughly going over the matter, have decided that there are several objections to this form of legislation.

In the first place, it would not take care of the 14 cases mentioned by the Indian Office the records of which do not seem clear, and even if there were fraud in those 14 cases, it is respectfully submitted that after so long a period it is now too late to question it. In most of the States it is the declared statutory policy to limit actions to a reasonable period even after the discovery of fraud.

Another objection to this suggestion is that in a number of cases in this territory the courthouses have been burned and the records destroyed. It would be impossible, in these cases at least, for the present claimants to trace the title back to the original purchasers. This legislation, then, might bring on litigation between individuals of an annoying and long-drawn-out nature.

It will be observed that the committee proposes an amendment whereby it is declared that the Government's title is abandoned in favor of those persons, estates, firms, or corporations who would be the lawful owners of said lands under the laws of Alabama, including the laws of prescription. This amendment, it is thought, meets any possible objection, if there be such, that the bill as originally framed specified no grantee or beneficiary.

Upon the lands involved there are farms and farmhouses, doubtless churches and schools; and in some instances towns have been built upon the same many years ago. The Government would not in the end gain anything by a proceeding to recover this property, and, on the contrary, many honest and innocent occupiers of the land after many years of cultivation and the expenditure of much labor and means in placing valuable improvements thereon would suffer many hardships and great loss.

I therefore respectfully urge that this bill receive favorable consideration, and trust that the same will pass as reported from the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the bill, on page 3, line 4, by striking out the word "Cheek" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "Creek." It is evidently a misprint.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, line 4, strike out the word "Cheek" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Creek."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and the third reading of the amended bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, so that I may have printed hereafter parts of the hearings before the Public Lands Committee. I also ask that the acting chairman of the Public Lands Committee [Mr. FERRIS] be given the privilege of extending his remarks in connection with this bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like the same request made for me.

Mr. CLAYTON. And I prefer the same request as to the gentleman from Illinois. And I will also include in the request my colleagues, Mr. DENT, Mr. HEFLIN, and Mr. BLACKMON, and also the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire if the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will be strictly in regard to this matter?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. AKIN of New York. I wish to inquire if the speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], which he will put in the RECORD, will be absolutely on this particular question that they have been talking about here?

The SPEAKER. The remarks must be confined to this question.

Mr. MANN. This is a very broad question, of course, referring to a public policy of the United States.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Of course it is broad if the gentleman from Illinois has anything to do with it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. AKIN of New York. No; there is no objection. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

The Chair will ask the House for its attention for just a moment. The bill just passed was the last bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar which, in the judgment of the Chair, was put on that calendar in time. We might as well have a ruling about it, and if the House does not like the ruling, they can appeal from it. The rule provides that the notification shall be three days in advance of these bills going on the calendar. The other bills were put on on March 1, but Sunday intervened; and when the Chair takes into consideration the intention of this three days' notice, it seems to the Chair that Sunday ought to be counted dies non, and that, therefore, these other bills have not had sufficient time. The Chair will state that that is going to be the ruling of the Chair all the time until it is overruled, and if any gentleman does not like the ruling he can appeal from it.

INAUGURATION DAY.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I arose to speak on the proposition before the House a while ago, and I addressed the Chair before he passed on to other business, but the Chair did not hear me.

The SPEAKER. Which proposition is it?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A proposition, Mr. Speaker, that is vital not only to this House and to the present occupant of the chair, but also to the country. It may be that the present Speaker will not always occupy the place which he holds now. It may be, too, that our friends from the great Commonwealth of Missouri, who have been complaining recently about "their dog having been kicked around when he comes to town," may find that upon the 4th of March next there will be weather conditions as inclement as they are to-day and as they were three years ago in the city of Washington. I rise, therefore, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of calling attention to this particular 4th of March, which is about as disagreeable as the other was, and to read an announcement that was made this morning in the Washington Herald, calling the attention of Congress and of the country to the facts. We had "a flare-back" in this city three years ago, and at every inauguration held on the 4th of March—

Mr. FITZGERALD rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania—
Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Pardon me one moment, Mr. Speaker; every inauguration has been one that affected not only the health but the lives of the people who have come here from all parts of the country. I desire, Mr. Speaker, without trespassing upon the privileges of the House, or in any way trenching upon the special privilege of my friend from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], to read this 4th of March reminder and to emphasize the public service rendered by the announcement of the Washington Herald:

A 4TH OF MARCH REMINDER.

With yesterday bleak and cold, and with snow falling early this morning, the Washington Herald begs to remind Congress that one year from to-day a President of the United States will be inaugurated, and that the date of inauguration day has not yet been changed.

The SPEAKER. Of course the gentleman is proceeding under unanimous consent.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, what is the matter to-day with the gentleman? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not answer that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think we are in the condition to-day that we may be one year hence. That is why I think the country ought to have its attention drawn to the conditions which prevail at the Capital to-day. We shall inaugurate a President of the United States one year hence.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My friend from Texas [Mr. HENRY] has introduced a joint resolution (No. 204) which proposes to change the date of the inauguration, and I think he is vindicated by the day.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does not the gentleman from Pennsylvania think that as a Republican he is unduly concerned about the character of the weather one year hence in the city of Washington? [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No, sir; I do not think so. It is important to this country that if the Speaker is to be promoted from his present position to the Presidency his health and life shall be preserved a year hence. It may be that the present Speaker will not be called upon to perform that service, and it may be that the present incumbent in the White House will be retained in his present position. But my contention is that the weather to-day is about as bad as it was three years ago, and that the date of the inauguration ought to be changed.

Let me emphasize the inclement conditions now prevailing, so that the country may understand the necessity for changing the date, which means so much to the health of the people who come here from all the States to witness the inauguration of a President. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] demands the regular order.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized.

COMMISSION OF ENSIGN TO MIDSHIPMEN UPON GRADUATION.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I move to discharge the Committee on Naval Affairs from the present consideration of Senate bill 3211, authorizing that commission of ensign be given midshipmen upon graduation from the Naval Academy, and to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. MANN. What is the number of the bill?

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Senate bill 3211.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 3211) authorizing that commission of ensign be given midshipmen upon graduation from the Naval Academy.

Be it enacted, etc., That the course at the Naval Academy shall be four years, and midshipmen on graduation shall be commissioned ensigns: Provided, That midshipmen now performing two years' service at sea in accordance with existing law shall be commissioned forthwith as ensigns from the date of the passage of this act: And provided, That those midshipmen of the class which was graduated in 1909, who have completed two years' service afloat, and who are due for promotion, shall be commissioned ensigns to take rank with the other members of their class, according to their standing as determined by their final multiples, respectively, for the six years' course, from the 5th day of June, 1911, the date of rank to which they were entitled prior to the passage of this act: And provided further, That no back pay or allowances shall result by reason of the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MANN. I demand a second.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT] asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT] is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to 20 minutes.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BATES].

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a brief statement in connection with this bill that is now before the House.

The provisions of the bill are, in short, that the graduates of the Naval Academy may be given their commissions on graduation, instead of being compelled to wait two years for them, as is now the law. The making of this change will bring the practice to conform with the practice at West Point, where the graduates of the military school are commissioned as second lieutenants upon completing the four years' course.

This legislation has been recommended by four successive Boards of Visitors to the Naval Academy, by the Superintendent of the Naval Academy, by the Secretary of the Navy, and the Assistant Secretaries of the Navy, and by the unanimous report of your Naval Committee.

The average age of the youth who graduates at the Naval Academy is 22 years, many of them being older.

The course of study and development prescribed at the Naval Academy is not an easy one. Those young men who have passed successfully there year after year and are finally recommended for graduation have come up to that point by a process of elimination and selection. Mental, physical, and moral delinquencies cause many to be dropped from year to year, and those who finally graduate are only those who have overcome all the difficulties and tests of the prescribed four years' course. They are, therefore, of an age and have acquired a sense of responsibility which entitles them at once to be made ensigns, the lowest commissioned rank. Their present status for two years after graduation is not an enviable one. They are in a very doubtful position. They are called upon to perform the duties of ensigns, and yet do not have the privileges of retirement if disabled in the line of duty which are accorded to commissioned officers.

Again, it is recognized that the scholastic course at Annapolis, as well as the entrance examination at that school, are fully as difficult, if not more so, than those at West Point. The Navy Department informs us that many young men fail mentally at Annapolis and are obliged to leave the academy who are often appointed to West Point and enter the class there of the same grade. It often happens—I use the word "often" advisedly—in many cases that young men who are not able to keep up with their classes at Annapolis are afterwards appointed to West Point and are able to finish the prescribed course and graduate at the same date that they would have graduated had they been permitted to remain at Annapolis.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BATES. I ask three minutes more.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I yield the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. BATES. Those young men who are transferred to West Point are enabled to graduate there and receive commissions two years in advance of the class which they left at Annapolis, and with which class they were unable to keep up. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that these cases here each present an argument in favor of equality being established and maintained between the two schools; that the finishing of a four years' course entitles them not only to graduation but to a commission.

The second proviso is intended merely to cover a temporary condition at present existing by reason of the fact that some of the members of the class of 1909 at the Naval Academy which finished their six years' course on June 4, 1911, have already been regularly commissioned ensigns to rank from June 5, 1911, while the commissioning of the remaining members of that class has been delayed pending the determination of their qualification for commission.

I introduced a similar bill which passed this House two years ago. This bill has passed the Senate and has been substituted for the House bill and recommended unanimously by the Naval Committee.

I believe it is an act of justice and highly desirable from every point of view that this bill be enacted into law. It will be an encouragement and an additional recognition. The young men who graduate at Annapolis feel that the country recognizes their services as being at once as valuable as the graduates at West Point, and that they are entitled at once to have the benefits and privileges as well as the duties of the junior commissioned officers in the Navy of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the Army and the Navy are special favorites of the Government and, like a good many other special favorites, are spoiled children. There is nothing that they can think of that they want that they do not ask for, and they cry like spoiled children if they do not get all of their requests granted.

We now take a young boy and put him at Annapolis, attempting to give him a training, a classical, mathematical, linguistic, scientific education, as well as an education relating to the investigation and control of vessels, firing of guns, and everything else that pertains to the Navy, in four years. We consider ourselves very fortunate in private life if we can take four years at college, study some of the rudiments for a professional career, and then spend two or four years in another college studying professional requirements. But we do all this now, according to the gentleman, in four years at Annapolis, and do not require the two extra years now required for technical professional training.

Now, the course is four years in the academic college at Annapolis, two years in professional training on board vessels before they are entitled to a commission. A boy goes to Annapolis at the age of 16, comes out now under this bill at the age of 20 commissioned as an officer, supposed to have a training and education that will carry him over the world in languages, carry him from the bottom of the sea to the height of the heavens in science, and provide him with the proper knowledge for navigation and battle, if battle occurs. I would extend this scholastic year instead of shortening it at Annapolis or West Point. Four years' training is not enough; six years' training is not enough.

Mr. BATES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. BATES. Is the gentleman not aware that while a boy may be admitted at the age of 16 there are very few indeed who enter at that age; that the average age, as stated by the Secretary of the Navy, is 18 years, and the average age at graduation is 22 years, and that possible one-third of the class are over 22 years of age? More than that, there has never been a petition or suggestion made to the department from an undergraduate or the boys who are affected; it has come from the authorities of the school and the Navy Department.

Mr. MANN. What does the gentleman mean by "petition" in reference to this matter?

Mr. BATES. The gentleman began his remarks by stating that these young men were spoiled children, asking for more. As far as I am concerned, and this bill was introduced by me in the House two years ago, passed unanimously, introduced again this year, and has passed the Senate in a similar form, and now the Senate bill is substituted for the House bill—I say as far as I am concerned there has never been a suggestion come from the young men on this subject.

Mr. MANN. I did not make the statement about the young men that the gentleman states. I said the Army and Navy were the special favorites. Nor is the other part of the gentleman's statement any more correct. This bill would not have the slightest show of consideration, much less passage, if Members of Congress did not appoint the midshipmen at Annapolis.

I am like the rest of you. What is the use of telling me that these boys have never made a request or paid any attention to this. I know better. I have had lots of Members tell me that their midshipman ought to receive a commission. They do not have the education. Instead of shortening the term of six years to four years, it would be better to lengthen it from six years to eight years. I am proud of the Navy, and it is not to be criticized for our lack of judgment in educating officers, but today it does not begin to have as good navigators as can be found in the private merchant marine or the other vessels of the Government, and why? Because these boys do not have a chance. They are required, theoretically, to know everything, including the management of ships, the firing of guns, knowledge of the engine room, of all the electrical machinery, and everything else of which you can conceive they are, theoretically, supposed to know; and we expect them to find it out there during their course of training or at our expense or their expense later on. The gentleman endeavors to reflect purposely, I think, upon West Point. I do not hold any brief for West Point, but I venture to say that the gentleman can not produce an instance where a boy has been dismissed from Annapolis because he did not come up to the scholastic requirements and then went to West Point and graduated within the same time that he would have graduated at Annapolis.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I yield for a question or for a very short statement.

Mr. BATES. I desired in my remarks to make no invidious comparisons or distinctions between West Point and Annapolis.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman did.

Mr. BATES. I beg to state for the benefit of the gentleman that Members of Congress appoint boys to West Point just as much as they do to Annapolis.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I did not need that information. I knew that before the gentleman came to the House.

Mr. BATES. And I beg also to inform the gentleman that the Assistant Secretary of the Navy personally informed me that, in his personal knowledge, many young men who failed at Annapolis were graduated at West Point and obtained their commissions two years in advance of their fellows with whom they were unable to keep up at Annapolis.

Mr. MANN. And I venture to say that whoever so informed the gentleman gave him misinformation, and that not a single instance of that can be produced, much less many instances in which boys left Annapolis because they could not meet the scholastic requirements and then went to West Point and graduated at the same time they would have graduated had they met the requirements and remained at Annapolis.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And I want to suggest that it is impossible for that to happen, unless they have extended the period at the Naval Academy.

Mr. MANN. That is the reason I make the statement. I know it is impossible.

Mr. BATES. How is it impossible?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I am not going to argue that question. I will guarantee the gentleman can not find a case.

I am tired of hearing the Navy Department or some official of the Navy Department endeavoring to pass a bill by berating and criticizing and unjustly condemning the sister department in the military defense of the Government. We have all the time some proposition coming up to help these gentlemen in some way. I do not blame them. As I say, they are spoiled children in reference to it; but why should we not require the boy that gets through Annapolis taking a scholastic training of four years—on the average entering Annapolis younger than they do at West Point—why should we not require that they take a technical training for two years?

If we wanted to make lawyers of these boys we would make them take three years. If we wanted to make doctors of them in my State we would require them to take a technical professional course of four years after going through college. Yet you assume when you graduate these boys from Annapolis that the moment they come out they are prepared to take command of war vessels. I think they ought to take a training on those vessels for two years. They are not without money during that time. It is true that if accident or disease happens to them during that period they are not entitled to be placed upon the retired list; but that is true of millions of their fellow countrymen. Few in the country are able to go on a retired list for life if some accident or some disease overtakes them just as they come out of college. I can see no reason for changing what has been the policy of the country for many years, if not ever since Annapolis was established, of requiring these midshipmen to take their training of two years at sea before they obtain their commissions.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If this bill should become a law, would it lessen by two years the time in which one of these officers would be entitled to be retired?

Mr. MANN. It would, I believe.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then what effect would that have upon those who have passed through the Naval Academy before and were not commissioned until the end of two years of sea service? Does it give these young men now an advantage in many respects consequent upon longevity pay over those already in the service?

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not think it would make any difference about that. Of course it would retire them or permit them to be retired that much earlier.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The longevity pay begins two years earlier.

Mr. MANN. Longevity pay now practically begins when they enter Annapolis.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman is right about that.

Mr. MANN. Although we inserted an amendment in the Army bill the other day to end that as far as the academies at Annapolis and West Point were concerned.

Mr. SLAYDEN. No, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is mistaken. It was amended so as not to operate against young men who had been at the Naval Academy and graduated there and then went in the Army.

Mr. MANN. Yes; I think the gentleman is right, it only applies to the Military Academy.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It ought to be made to apply to both.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly if it is made to apply to one it will be made to apply to the other. I do not know whether it will be in either case. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has six minutes remaining.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON].

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, the only question involved in this bill as I understand it is whether a midshipman who, after attending the Naval Academy for four years, shall be graduated with a commission as ensign or whether he shall be compelled to serve an additional two years before he receives that commission. There is no necessity for instituting any invidious comparisons between the Naval or the Military Academies. That is aside from the question, which is, Does this bill provide a proper course to take? Every Board of Visitors appointed to the Naval Academy for many, many years has recommended that action be taken as provided in the pending bill. They have made their recommendation after full consultation with the superintendent and the corps of professors at the Naval Academy, all of whom are naval officers. They make their recommendation with a full knowledge of the equipment of these young men for a proper discharge of the important duties to be imposed upon them. The passage of this bill does not mean that the technical training of these young men is to be brought to an end.

On the contrary, the training of a naval officer in our Navy is not brought to an end until he attains the rank of rear admiral. He must stand examination for every promotion that he secures from the time he enters the academy as a midshipman to that period in his career when he is made a rear admiral. Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is mistaken when he lays down the proposition that if this bill passes the naval officer will be compelled to serve two years less before he reaches retirement. That is not true. He must serve exactly the same number of years before retirement if this bill should become law that he serves now.

Mr. MANN. But he can retire two years younger.

Mr. BURLESON. No; he will not be permitted to retire two years younger, he must serve the same length of time. Now, the question is this—

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Right in that connection, if this act passes that gives him two years more of service as an officer than he gets under existing law.

Mr. BURLESON. He will not have one month or one day less time as such, and of that I am absolutely certain. Now, back to the issue. This proposition has been heretofore submitted to the House on several occasions, and it has each time received the unanimous approval of the House. It has often been submitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and has just as often been unanimously favorably reported from that committee—

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. BURLESON. In a moment. I do not want to reflect upon the store of information possessed by the gentleman from Illinois, we all know he is a wise man, but I must say that when the Board of Visitors to the Naval Academy and the professors and officers, who are naval officers, at the Naval Academy and the Members who constitute the Committee on Naval Affairs all have uniformly unanimously indorsed this proposition, surely they have some little information with reference to naval matters upon which we may safely rely. I do not think they have all been in error all these years. They know a little about this matter.

Mr. MANN. Why do they not give it in this bill?

Mr. BURLESON. They have given us the benefit of their information, and you will have more of it in a few minutes from the gentleman from Maryland. Now, I want to say in all fairness that these young men are entitled to receive their commissions as ensigns when they graduate from the Naval Academy. It would be unjust and unfair, or rather, I will say, it would be quite as fair, to require cadets who graduate at the Military Academy to continue to serve as cadets in the Army for two years after their graduation before commissioning them as lieutenants as to force these young naval officers to serve two years as midshipmen before they receive their commissions as ensigns.

It will not diminish in the slightest the technical training they receive. It will not diminish in the slightest or increase in the slightest the responsibilities that will be imposed upon them whether this bill becomes a law or not. It should pass as an act of justice to them.

Mr. RAKER. I would like to ask the gentleman what is the extra expense or cost occasioned by this bill?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] desire to consume the balance of his time?

Mr. MANN. How much time remains on the two sides?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has six minutes and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT] eight minutes.

Mr. MANN. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I am obliged to the gentleman, because I am in favor of this measure. I told the gentleman I was opposed to his contention, and he has given me a minute, but I can hardly express my views in that time and give my reasons why I am in favor of the passage of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Then I will give you two minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. Thank you. That is better. The reason for requiring the two years extra upon these young men has entirely disappeared. It has disappeared along with the ancient ship. Years ago, when we had few ships, they were sailing ships. We had then a good many officers. We had plenty of officers and not enough ships. It became necessary for the young men to go to sea to accustom themselves to the use of the sail as well as the use of the mast. That practice is demanded no longer. Therefore the occasion for the extra two years does not exist. In the judgment of the visitors at the academy, and in the judgment of the members of the Naval Affairs Committee, who have considered the question many years, the reason for a continuance of the rule has entirely disappeared. We think it is better to conclude the education of the young men in four years and commission them ensigns at the end of that time, because when they are at sea during the two years they perform all the duties of ensign and are entitled to the commission. If anything happens to them or if they are hurt during that period, they can not be retired as the law now is, because they do not have the legal status. I have heard of several young men who contracted disease in the line of duty during the period we seek to abolish and have never received the advantages of retirement, because Congress has not seen fit to extend it; others have been retired by special law.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think, perhaps, I was mistaken in saying that the passage of this bill might give retirement at an earlier age than under the existing law, because I am informed that some bright genius somewhere got a construction of the law that was never contemplated by Congress, when it passed the retirement law, that the service commenced when the man entered the academy, so that the 6 years now counts as service for the purpose of retirement after 30 years' service, so that a man can be retired under certain conditions at the age of 46, a very sensible age at which to retire a man, of course.

Of course, the Naval Affairs Committee are for the bill; of course, the naval officers are for the bill; of course, the visitors to the Naval Academy are for the bill; of course, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] is for the bill, as all are under the influence of the desire of these men to receive the commissions, including the gentleman from Texas. They are subject to the influences that ought not to control this House—the personal touch, like the kissing of a bill through the committee and through the House, the influence of one person on another as a matter of kindness. But the real kindness to these men is to make them serve.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] says that the occasion of the two years has passed away because the sailing vessel is no longer used. Do I understand my friend from Pennsylvania to say that it does not require more skill now to understand the management of a modern warship, controlled by steam and electricity, than it did in the old days, when any boy on the coast knew how to handle the sails and navigate sailing vessels? Do I understand now that it takes less knowledge to understand these great fighting machines, some of which have in them from 500 to 1,000 different machines, than it did in the old days, when it required very little skill to understand the furling and unfurling of sails?

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BATES]?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I never in my life in this House asked to interrupt a man in the last minute he had.

Mr. BATES. I will not interrupt the gentleman, then.

Mr. MANN. I know you will not.

Mr. BATES. Not without your consent, at least.

Mr. MANN. Well, I will consent.

Mr. BATES. I thank the gentleman. The gentleman from Illinois has intimated that Members of Congress are under some spell or influence.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. I did not say Members of Congress were. I said the Committee on Naval Affairs was. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is under this spell. He is always advocating something that the Navy wants that it ought not to have. [Laughter.]

Mr. BATES. I wish to ask why three successive Secretaries of the Navy have strongly advocated the passage of this bill? Are they under any spell?

Mr. MANN. Why, certainly; they are under the same influence. Everybody understands that, just as the Army constantly does it and the Navy constantly does it. It is always the same influence, coming from the bottom up to the top. And it is not confined to the Army and Navy, although it is worse there than anywhere else.

Now, I am opposed to permitting this personal solicitation of men who simply wish to advance themselves a little more rapidly in pay and rank following into committees and into Congress and controlling.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, the proposition involved in this bill is a very good one. A young man goes to West Point and completes his course of four years and is graduated and receives his diploma and his commission as a second lieutenant. A young man goes to Annapolis and studies four years in a course just as severe and at the end of four years graduates and receives his diploma, but does not receive his commission. He has to wait two years in order to receive his commission and then he receives the commission of ensign, which corresponds with that of second lieutenant which the young man at West Point receives.

This bill is simply to place the two upon an equality and to provide that the date at which the young man at Annapolis receives his commission shall be at time of graduation and not two years later, just as the young man at West Point receives his.

The gentleman from Illinois speaks of "kissing" bills through the committee. I think that the gentleman will agree that there are quite a number of propositions that come to the Committee on Naval Affairs that are not kissed through the committee. There are a good many bills he will find, if he will come and examine our records, that are turned down.

But I want to say that not only has this committee unanimously reported this bill, but the committee in the last Congress, which was largely of a different personnel, approved the bill unanimously, and it was passed by the House, I believe, without any opposition, but failed to get through the Senate on account of the lateness of the session. It passed, I believe, unanimously the previous Committee on Naval Affairs. It has been recommended by the last four or five Boards of Visitors to the Academy. It has received the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, and, I believe, also of the President in his recommendations. It has now passed the Senate without opposition and comes over here and receives the indorsement of the committee and the committee's unanimous recommendation, and I ask that the bill be passed.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. PADGETT. With pleasure.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman quotes the Boards of Visitors as the authority which recommended this legislation. Has the gentleman ever heard of a Board of Visitors that did not recommend what the superintendent of the academy requested them to?

Mr. PADGETT. I know of four boards during my service on the committee that have recommended this legislation.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Have they recommended anything that the superintendents were opposed to?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know as to that, but I know they have refused to recommend things that have been advocated by the superintendent.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will take up the debate where Mr. PADGETT left off. A second lieutenant in the Army, if he is injured in the service or contracts a disease in line of duty and comes up for promotion and is found deficient, either physically or mentally, by reason of something that has happened to him in the service, is retired or pensioned. No matter what may happen to these young midshipmen in these two years, they are not entitled to relief. They may meet with accidents in the service. They may contract disease in the service, and when they are examined for promotion and found to be unfit or deficient, they are turned loose—discharged from the Navy. They can not be retired, they can not get a pension, without a special act of Congress. The gentleman from Illinois knows that in the very last Congress we had a fight on the floor of this House to place upon the retired list Midshipman Blankenship, who entered the Academy from Virginia. We have had private bills in every Congress to relieve midshipmen who are unfortunate in the two years intervening between graduation from Annapolis and their being commissioned as ensigns.

So far as the Navy is concerned, there is no comparison between the education they give these boys and that received in private colleges, because the boy who graduates at college, who is sent there by financially able parents, after he receives his education can go where he pleases and do as he pleases. But these boys who are educated at the Government expense belong to the Government. They can be made to pace the deck from morning until night and from night until morning. They are owned by the Government. In case of war they are shot at and receive injuries. Those who survive do become great men. They become admirals in the Navy. They have been the pride of the country, and these young men who will get the benefit of this law will live to be the pride of the country.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

Mr. PADGETT. With the committee amendments.

The SPEAKER. The motion includes the amendments.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that in his opinion two-thirds had voted in the affirmative.

Mr. MANN. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 79, noes 5.

Accordingly, two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSISSIPPI RIVER, BEMIDJI, MINN.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 4151) to authorize the Minnesota & International Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Bemidji, in the State of Minnesota, with committee amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Minnesota & International Railway Co., a corporation organized under the laws of Minnesota, its successors and assigns, are hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Mississippi River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation in the northwest quarter of section 16, township 146, range 33 west, at or near Bemidji, in Beltrami County, State of Minnesota, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

Sec. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded? The Chair hears no demand. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. I did not hear the motion. It includes the amendments, does it not?

The SPEAKER. Under suspension of the rules the House passes the bill as read, and the amendments are read into the bill.

The question was taken; and two-thirds voting in the affirmative, the rules were suspended, and the bill passed.

PORTO RICO.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move to discharge the Committee on Insular Affairs from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 20048) declaring that all citizens of Porto Rico and certain natives permanently residing in said island shall be citizens of the United States, and to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to discharge the Committee on Insular Affairs from further consideration of the bill, which will be reported by the Clerk, and that the same be passed.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all citizens of Porto Rico, as defined by section 7 of the act of April 12, 1900, "temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," and all natives of Porto Rico who were temporarily absent from that island on April 11, 1899, and have since returned and are permanently residing in that island and are not citizens of any foreign country, are hereby declared, and shall be deemed and held to be, citizens of the United States: Provided, That any person hereinbefore described may retain his present political status by making a declaration, under oath, of his decision to do so within six months of the taking effect of this act.

before the district court in the district in which he resides, the declaration to be in form as follows:

"I, _____, being duly sworn, hereby declare my intention not to become a citizen of the United States as provided in the act of Congress conferring United States citizenship upon citizens of Porto Rico and certain natives permanently residing in said island."

In the case of any such person who may be absent from the island during said six months, the terms of this proviso may be availed of by transmitting a declaration, under oath, in the form herein provided within six months of the taking effect of this act, to the secretary of Porto Rico.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MANN. I demand a second.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois to 20 minutes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is twofold. One of its purposes is to settle and definitely fix the political and civil status of the people of the island of Porto Rico. The other is to make those persons who are now defined to be citizens of Porto Rico citizens of the United States.

During the second session of the Sixty-first Congress a bill providing for American citizenship for the people of Porto Rico was passed by this House. This bill is recommended by the Secretary of War and each of the great political parties of this country in its last national platform declared unequivocally in favor of conferring American citizenship upon the people of Porto Rico. So this bill involves no political question. It has the indorsement of both the Republican and the Democratic Party.

The organic act of Porto Rico, approved April 12, 1900, known as the Foraker Act, provided that all inhabitants continuing to reside in Porto Rico who were Spanish subjects on the 11th day of April, 1899, and then residing therein, and their children born subsequent thereto, should be deemed and held to be citizens of Porto Rico.

This bill proposes not only to make the citizens of Porto Rico, as defined in the Foraker Act, citizens of the United States, but also those natives of Porto Rico who were temporarily absent from the island on the 11th of April, 1899, and who have returned thereto and are now permanently residing therein, and who are not citizens of any foreign country.

In order that nobody in Porto Rico affected by this proposed legislation may hereafter be able to say that the people of Porto Rico were not consulted as to whether or not they should be made citizens of the United States, it is provided in this bill that within six months after its passage any citizen of Porto Rico may go into the district court of the district in which he resides and declare his purpose not to become a citizen of the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are a great many eminent lawyers who hold—and I may say that such is the opinion of the attorney general of Porto Rico—that citizens of Porto Rico are already citizens of the United States. I, Mr. Speaker, believe that this is true, but they have not been held to be such by those who administer the laws of Porto Rico, either in this country or that island.

Section 1891 of the Revised Statutes of the United States of 1878 declares that the Constitution and the laws of the United States not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect in the organized Territories of the United States and those to be hereafter organized as elsewhere in the United States.

I think, Mr. Speaker, it can not be successfully contended that Porto Rico is not an organized Territory of the United States; and if that be true, then the Constitution of the United States must be in effect there as elsewhere in the United States.

When the organic act providing for a civil government in the Philippines was passed it was expressly provided in that act that section 1891 of the Revised Statutes of 1878 should not apply to those islands, but no such exception was made in the organic act of Porto Rico. The reason for this omission was that it was generally understood in this country that Porto Rico was to become a permanent part of the Territory of the United States, whilst Congress purposely and designedly refrained from defining the political and civil status of the people of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes; for a question.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I notice the form in which the bill is prepared; in one blanket provision it would make all the people of Porto Rico citizens, except those that might declare their intention of not wishing to become citizens of the United States. Does not the gentleman think that citizenship of the United States is of dignity and importance enough to reverse that? And does not the gentleman think the preferable way would be to give the citizens of Porto Rico an opportunity to declare that it was their intention to become citizens of the United States?

Mr. JONES. I will say in reply to the gentleman from South Dakota that such a proposition was presented to this House in the Sixty-first Congress, but the House amended the bill so as to provide for collective citizenship. At that time, if my memory is not at fault, the administration favored such a measure as the gentleman suggests, but now the Secretary of War, in the strongest possible terms, recommends the passage of a collective citizenship measure such as this, with the proviso that any citizen of Porto Rico who does not desire American citizenship may go into a court and so declare.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman another question. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Certainly, for a question.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I was going to ask the gentleman what reason can be given to the House why this latter method is preferable to the former?

Mr. JONES. If we are going to bestow American citizenship upon the people of Porto Rico at all, we ought, I think, to do it collectively and not compel each one of the male adults in a population of eleven hundred thousand people to go into a court and go through a process of naturalization, which I understand to be the proposition of the gentleman. If we are going to give them American citizenship it should be done freely and not grudgingly.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 11 minutes left.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I take it the gentleman referred a moment ago to the Olmsted bill, wherein we adopted this provision in the Sixty-first Congress?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Why has not the gentleman to-day brought in the rest of the Olmsted bill or something related to it?

Mr. JONES. I will say frankly to the gentleman that the reason this citizenship measure was not embraced in a general measure, as was the case with the Olmsted bill, was that American citizenship is a subject of very great interest to the Porto Ricans, and one of sufficient importance to be dealt with in a separate measure. Moreover, the author of the Olmsted bill suggested the course which has been followed. This is a unanimous report, and it was not believed there would be any opposition to this bill in the House. It may not be so easy to obtain unanimous committee action in support of a general measure intended as a substitute for the Foraker Act, and therefore it was thought that such a bill might be contested, whilst this would not.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, my friend from Virginia [Mr. Jones] has just stated that, in his judgment, the Porto Ricans were already citizens of the United States, and that Porto Rico was already a Territory of the United States. I have great regard for the opinion of my friend from Virginia, and yet his opinion on that subject reminds me somewhat of an opinion enunciated at one time by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary of this House a few years ago, a very distinguished Republican, who made an elaborate argument to prove that Cuba was a part of the United States, and that there was no way under the Constitution by which we could get rid of it.

It may be there is some doubt about what is a Territory of the United States, because I notice by the caucus print of the Democratic excise bill, about to be brought before the House, that they do not assume just what is the territory of the United States or just what is the United States. That bill says "residing in the United States, any Territory thereof, or Alaska, or the District of Columbia"—that something shall be done, which would seem to eliminate the Territory and Alaska and the District of Columbia out of the United States. Perhaps they intended to include Porto Rico, however, under the term "Territory."

Mr. JONES. Organized Territories.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, our language in reference to territories is not very accurate, but I do not think anybody will very seriously contend that Porto Rico is an organized Territory. I believe the time has passed when it would do any good to oppose this bill. I do not think we ought to pass a bill of this sort without some knowledge of its natural consequence. It is as inevitable, in my judgment, as that the sun will rise to-morrow, that when Porto Rico is an organized Territory of the United States and her citizens are made citizens of the United States, they will at once commence to demand admission into the Union with greater force and with better logic than they ask to be made citizens. If they are citizens of the United States with a population such as they have, it is not practicable for any long time to deny their request or demand that they shall remain a State of the Union. Perhaps that is the proper thing to do. Perhaps there is good reason for doing it, and yet I have some doubt about it. It is quite likely that we would in some way have amalgamated Cuba before this time if it were not for the danger which might come to our country by admitting as States into the Union with possibly deciding power in the Senate, if not the House, peoples who are somewhat, at least, strange to our internal problems and to our form of civilization.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois. [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I question the wisdom of the enactment of this bill into law. We have the Monroe doctrine. We have had the War with Spain. We are responsible for Cuba. We are responsible for Porto Rico. The gentleman says it is a Territory. I do not so understand it. We are responsible for the Philippines. We control the customhouses in Santo Domingo, and practically in Honduras. If the Monroe doctrine is to continue as it will continue no one knows what is to happen during the swing of the twentieth century. The people of Porto Rico—and I weigh my words when I speak of Porto Rico, because I have been there—do not understand, as we understand it, government of the people, by the people. They have a different language.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is it possible for them to become competent?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe, considering they are 20 degrees north of the Equator, considering all of the conditions, with Haiti, San Domingo, Central America, and elsewhere, that they are competent for self-government. That is as much as we can do at all times without conflict [laughter], let alone people down there, north of the Equator, mixed blood. Oh, there are men in Porto Rico who are fully as strong as I am, but one swallow does not make a summer—

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. CANNON. I have only five minutes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I just wanted to protest against that last statement of the gentleman. I am in sympathy with a great deal of what the gentleman states, but I can not agree to that.

Mr. CANNON. I met some very bright men in Porto Rico, and very patriotic men.

Mr. SLAYDEN. No doubt.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Christ died to save all; yes, but all that he died for are not now competent of self-government on this earth. We require education touching our outlying possessions and what may be our outlying possessions. Here we are very apt to measure everybody's corn in our half bushel. I undertake to say that if you pick up a million people, your kind of people and my kind of people—the Caucasian race—and put them for 100 years or 200 years or 300 years, without any unmixed blood, 20 degrees south of the Equator, I undertake to say, in my judgment, the civilization would decrease in force, in capacity for self-government. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has well said this is but the entering wedge for a demand for statehood. They are protected. I do not know, but as I am informed by people who are familiar, 75 or 80 per cent of those people are mixed blood in part and are not equal to the full-blood Spaniard and not equal, in my judgment, to the unmixed African, and yet they are to be made citizens of the United States.

They are entitled to protection at the hands of the people of a great Republic and will receive it, but I think we could be a little slow about this wholesale legislation. Therefore, holding the views that I do about it, seeing what there is in the future, I shall be glad to know that if there is an addition to statehood—

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. One word further.

Mr. MANN. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. I think one is sufficient. I should be glad to know that there is capacity on the average for self-government. Does anybody dispute that proposition? I pause for somebody to combat it. Why, you may say, you may go out in the mountain States, with a small population; but if you will take the zone in which the people in the United States proper reside and then consider the race, they grow and grow, they pass through a period of childhood, have an experience that a growing Commonwealth has, and the history of the States proper shows that we can successfully—

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. MANN. I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. That we can successfully build a Commonwealth, or that they can build Commonwealths, in the present area of the continental United States. [Applause.] For one, I am not ready to vote for this bill at this time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia has 11 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Illinois 6.

Mr. MANN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MORSE].

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, in the three minutes which have been granted me it will not be possible to make any argument affecting the merits of the bill. I will content myself, however, with calling the attention of the House to the fact that this is one of the first bills to come from the Committee on Insular Affairs. There are a large number of very important bills there, one or two of which have been reported out and are now on the calendar of the House. I think the attention of the membership of the House ought to be called to these matters on account of the great importance which attaches to them. I believe with the gentleman from Illinois that we are very shortly to be brought face to face with the problem of the disposition not only of Porto Rico, not only of the Philippine Islands, but with other territory as well, and I realize that we might just as well commence to prepare ourselves to face those problems at this time. I certainly believe that we should grant to these people at this time American citizenship. They are citizens only of Porto Rico, a most anomalous position.

They were formerly citizens of Spain. They are not recognized as citizens of any country, and it seems to me that their political status ought to be fixed. We have taken this territory. They have consented to become a part of this country, and it seems to me that they are entitled not only to the protection, but to all the rights of American citizens. They are a loyal people. They are a people that have given us no trouble and no expense. The community under our laws is extremely prosperous. We have there instituted our system of public schools. The proportion of negro blood is not much larger, if it is any larger, in Porto Rico than it is in the great State of South Carolina. And I believe that while the quality of citizenship is not as high as it ought to be, yet they should be given the privilege of American citizenship at this time.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I regard it a privilege to have served in this House for a number of years with the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

In that time I have heard many words of wisdom fall from his lips, but never any nonsense. I have heard him make many bitter, partisan statements that I thought unfair and inexact when they undertook to state the position of his political enemies, and I have known him to take many positions on public questions that I thought were wrong. But with it all he has always been strong and usually wise and patriotic. Never, however, have I in all my experience with him in this House known him to say truer or more important things than he did to-day in the brief debate on the bill from the Committee on Insular Affairs that proposes to confer collective citizenship on the people of Porto Rico.

I occupy a peculiar position, and not a very promising one from the point of view of results, with reference to this bill. I am against both sides to the controversy. I sympathize with the Porto Ricans, but not with this measure.

The very fact that we are undertaking legislation for an alien people who do not even live on this continent shows how far wrong we have gone since we went to war with Spain 14 years ago about a lot of other aliens living on another island and between whom and ourselves there is no real social or political sympathy.

It is an embarrassing incident in the logic of events, just one of many that will vex us before we shall be done with them.

In 1898, under pressure from "yellow" journals, and on the hysterical demands of the people whom they had excited, we embarked in a series of military enterprises that have emptied the Treasury and bankrupted us in our political morals. The history of the Spanish-American War is the Iliad of our woes. If Spain bears us ill will she must be happy in the contemplation of our failure in colonial government in the Philippines and in Porto Rico, and in the embarrassment and expense that these unsuccessful efforts to do an un-American thing have caused us.

To assert sovereignty over an unwilling people we have abandoned American principles; have thrown to the winds the wise policies bequeathed us by the fathers. We went away from our own shores in search of adventure and by force of arms annexed an incongruous, inharmonious, and entirely unassimilable people, both in the East and in the South, in the Philippines and in the West Indies. In both instances we got a people who can make no contribution to our political institutions, no contribution to our civilization in any way, that we would regard as valuable.

I do not mean to reflect on either the West Indians or the Filipinos. They view everything from a different angle. In Porto Rico the people are Spanish, or African negro, or the mulatto produce of the union of the two. In the Philippines they are Christian and Moslem, Spanish, Malay, and Negro, or the hybrid produce of all. I can not speak with accuracy or any great degree of confidence of the ethnologic history of the Filipinos as a people. But certainly they are not Saxon or English, and they also view matters political from a different angle. The Lord, in His wisdom, made them different, and that is all I have to say about them ethnologically.

In saying that they look at things from a different viewpoint I do not mean to say that they are mentally deficient or incapable of self-government. Certainly they can govern themselves better and more to their own satisfaction than we can govern them. Alien rule is never satisfactory, and when people protest against it it is a sign that they are worth while. Our own continent and its history is a splendid illustration of the truth of that statement. One by one every Spanish colony threw off the yoke of Spain, as did those that one time confessed allegiance to Brazil. Our own Federal Republic is the result of a protest against government imposed from an European throne. The point of the Boer sword has written bloody chapters in the history of Great Britain, and all because the English, who will cheerfully die to maintain their own liberties, have been unwilling to concede to others a privilege that they cherish for themselves. India is kept quiet only by the weight of guns. And so it goes throughout the world. Here and there, in Asia and in Africa, minor peoples, and usually colored peoples, are now and then in open revolt against alien control.

It is precisely the political scheme that was condemned by our patriot fathers when they declared that governments derive all their just powers from the consent of the governed. What the Americans rejected in 1776 they embraced in 1899 when their baser nature was aroused.

Mr. Speaker, plus the differing views as to forms of government, there is another and an ineradicable difference between these people of Asia and Africa with whom European Governments and our own, I may add, have been at war so often. It is the difference in color. For some reason that I do not perfectly understand, and perhaps should not try to explain, there is such a thing as race hostility. Philanthropists may shut their eyes to it, may deny its existence, may say it is un-Christian, but the fact that they deny it or condemn it does not remove it.

It does exist and it can not be abolished.

In the economy of nature it serves a useful purpose. Nature, the Lord, if I may be permitted to say so, loves a thoroughbred. Nature abhors the hybrid and shows it by the denial, partial in some cases, complete in others, of the fecundity that has been given the thoroughbred.

I am moved to these observations by the remark of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who says that he believes that the hybrid, the cross between the blacks and whites, or between the browns and whites, is less well fitted for self-government than the full-blooded African Negro.

I can not say that I differ from the gentleman in his rule, yet I fail to recall at the moment any conspicuous, indeed, any moderate, success in government by the Negro race, hybrid or thoroughbred.

Take Haiti, for example. The people of that island are nearly or quite black. They are almost an unmixed race. But no one will cite Haiti, I fancy, as an illustration of the ability of the negro to conduct government.

If one may credit the statements of writers and travelers, the so-called Republic of Haiti is a turbulent travesty of government frequently "tempered by assassination." The Haitians do not appear to have advanced in civilization or in the arts of government since they ceased to be a colony of France a hundred years ago. So much for the pure black Negro.

In Santo Domingo and in Cuba, where the blacks are important, if not the dominant figures of political life, there is almost unceasing turmoil. The Cuban Government started a few years ago without debt, without the necessity of maintaining an army and navy, and with sovereignty over a compact, seagirt island of phenomenal richness. What has happened?

One intervention by the Government of the United States at the expense of the taxpayers of this country and another impending, deficits where there was a surplus revenue, and great debts where there was high credit.

Then there is Liberia, the pet project of that large class that appears to believe that because men have permitted themselves to be enslaved they possess some wonderful virtue and capacity. Liberia is no exception to the rule of incapacity shown by the most deeply colored of all the "colored" races. As a government it was started for, and partly by, former American slaves, and it has been nursed through several political distempers by this Government and by the people who have devoted themselves to the uplift of the Negro race. Like all the other governments of the African race and the African hybrid, it has broken down in its finances. Whether that is due to inherent dishonesty or a lack of understanding of figures I can not undertake to say, but it is true that Haiti, Santo Domingo, and Liberia have all stranded now and then on financial rocks, and Cuba faces a similar disaster.

Let us consider for a moment conditions in Latin America, a part of this continent with which we now have much to do, and, in the opinion of the gentleman from Illinois, will have more to do in the future.

Mr. Speaker, the turbulence of the Spanish-American Governments can not, I believe, be fairly charged against the Spaniards. The Kingdom of Spain has not been free from wars and revolutions, but it is highly improbable that it has had more than has fallen to the lot of France, England, Italy, or many of the German States.

In all these Central and South American States there is a large population of mixed bloods. The progeny of the union of the Spaniard and native Indian is not without ability. Many of them have been men of high order of ability. They have produced great statesmen like Juarez and Diaz in Mexico, great orators, painters, and writers, but it can not be denied that they seem to lack the calm judgment so essential in the conduct of the affairs of state.

They seem to be in a sort of plastic condition. It may be that they have not yet developed the particular form of government that is best suited to their natures and genius. They have flattered the Anglo-Teutonic-American by imitating his governmental plan, but it does not appear to be entirely satisfactory. Why it has failed offers an interesting field for study and discussion.

In a recent issue of the Daily Mexican, published in the City of Mexico, there appeared an editorial that was originally printed in La Prensa and which was written by a member of the Mexican Congress, Mr. Francisco Bulnes.

I will read a part of what Mr. Bulnes has to say:

In treating the revolutionary question we must therefore abandon all sentimental methods; all appeals, tears, and supplications are ineffective, and have never been of the slightest use. The only feasible way out of the difficulty for the Government is by means of the bayonet, and without a goodly number of sabers, accompanied by rapid-fire guns, cannons, and dynamite bombs (the last-named most effective weapon having been enthusiastically adopted during the recent struggle), nothing can be accomplished.

The provisional government of Mr. de la Barra and the Government of Mr. Madero alike have failed to grasp the fact that the basis of every Latin government must repose on a supply of bayonets in proportion to the amount of invincible and inevitable odium which is always felt by all Latin peoples for their governments.

In all Latin-American countries the necessity for the bayonet is great, and the very first question to settle, after the triumph of the revolutionary arms, should have been to attend to the organization of these bayonets as the only possible means of establishing the Mexican Government on a firm foundation.

We do not by this mean to imply that the revolution should have thrown itself into militarism; not at all; but it is an established fact that Latin democracies have never yet been able to exist without the bayonet.

If Mr. Bulnes is right in his description of the Latin-American countries and people, he clearly establishes one thing, and that is that intimate political association with them would be a source of unceasing embarrassment for us. Their ideas of government, according to Mr. Bulnes, and ours are not the same. With them, if he is right, the military must be the most conspicuous feature of government. Under our plan it is the least conspicuous.

But I am wandering from my text, the remarkable speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. He said:

The people of Porto Rico do not understand, as we understand it, government of the people by the people. They have a different language.

Mr. CANNON might have said—and would certainly have been more accurate if he had said—that as a whole they have a different color. That would better have explained what he conceives to be their incapacity for "government of the people by the people." Color in this matter is more important than language.

Let us follow him for a little in some of his other statements. He says:

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe—they are 20 degrees north of the Equator—considering all of the conditions with Haiti, Santo Domingo, Central America, and elsewhere, that they are capable of self-government. That is as much as we can do at all times without conflict [laughter], let alone people down there, north of the Equator, mixed blood.

In that statement the distinguished gentleman hit upon a great truth. Froude went to the West Indies predisposed to think well, the best, of the colored races and hybrids who inhabit those islands, and came away vastly discouraged and confessing their incapacity.

It is clearly due to the two causes suggested by Mr. CANNON, to wit, the character of the people and the climate. The Tropics seem to heat the blood while enervating the people who inhabit them. There may have been strong, orderly governments in the Tropics, but I do not recall them. There may be some in the future, but I doubt it.

Let me quote again from the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois. He said:

Now, Christ died to save all; yes; but all He died for are not now competent for self-government on this earth. We require education touching our outlying possessions and what may be our outlying possessions. Here we are very apt to measure everybody's corn in our half bushel. I undertake to say that if you pick up a million of people, your kind of people and my kind of people—the Caucasian race—and put them for 100 years or 200 years or 300 years, without any unmixed blood, 20 degrees south of the Equator, I undertake to say, in my judgment, the civilization would decrease in force, in capacity for self-government.

Again he hit upon a great truth. It is a truth that was recognized several years ago by another eminent son of Illinois, the late Col. Robert Ingersoll, at the time the annexation of Santo Domingo was under consideration. Ingersoll stated the same thing in a different way. He said that the Tropics were not suited to the white race, and declared that if we had the island of Santo Domingo without a single native or black inhabitant and settled it with New England deacons and their families the climatic influence would soon reduce them to the level of the hybrid people whom they displaced.

If—

Said Col. Ingersoll—

a traveler went to the island after a lapse of 50 years he would find the descendants of these New England deacons hatless and shoeless, going about on any Sunday morning with a cock under each arm looking for a fight.

In substance, Mr. Speaker, the two distinguished men from Illinois have agreed as to the influence of climate on character.

I quite agree with the suggestion that we have no right to hold any people in subjection to our laws forever unless they are citizens. It is contrary to the spirit of our institutions. That is one of the reasons why I want to give the Filipinos absolute independence. I would also give the people of Porto Rico independence. We can retain our coaling and naval station there. We can create a condition from the military point of view that will give us every advantage, so far as the defense of the Panama Canal is concerned, and retain only a small part of the island. We could give the Porto Ricans complete independence in the matter of local government. We could give them an opportunity to show their capacity for the conduct of government.

By so doing we could gratify the very natural ambition of the Porto Ricans to govern their own island, and without risk permit an interesting experiment of a social and political nature while we avoided their demand for statehood.

We are in an awkward situation with reference to these islands in Porto Rico and the Philippines, and every Member of this House knows it. They have read the Declaration of Independence and appeal to it. They have studied our Constitution and are familiar with that document. They charge us with inconsistency, and, what is worse, Mr. Speaker, they prove it. They know that we tax them without permitting representation in our Congress, something that was a crime when done by the British Parliament, but which does not appear so wicked when we play the rôle of King George and his parliamentarians.

Many people in this country who want to sever the tie that binds us to tropical and alien people take that position, because they see in it danger for us. They agree with the view of the gentleman from Illinois that people who "live within 20 degrees of the equator" can neither comprehend nor support representative government constructed on the Anglo-Saxon plan.

They also see the physical degeneracy that will come from personal contact. Intimate personal association will result, as it nearly always has resulted, in a race of hybrids, who will, if experience may guide us to a conclusion, inherit the vices of both parents and the virtues of neither.

That danger has been recognized by England and Germany, and steps have been taken to avoid it. Of the two, England has made the greater effort to preserve the purity of the blood of her people, but Germany is not far behind in the struggle to keep an undefiled racial standard.

Right here, Mr. Speaker, I ask the privilege of inserting an editorial taken from the Washington Post of this morning that tells how Germany is endeavoring to keep the blood of her people pure.

THE WHITE MAN'S BURDEN.

It has taken Germany until now to learn in her colonial possessions the lesson which the Anglo-Saxon has taught since the time men first began going down to the sea in ships and ruling over inferior races in distant lands. It is a lesson as simple as that water and oil will not mix. The German secretary of state for the colonies has issued an order forbidding marriages between Germans and natives in Samoa, where, no doubt, it will create considerable consternation owing to the freedom with which the Europeans in the island have taken native girls as wives in the past. Marriages already contracted are to be legal, and offspring from these unions are to be regarded as Germans, but hereafter the children born of such are to be treated as natives.

In Borneo the children of Dutch fathers and native mothers derive their nationality from their male parents. Germany in the East now embarks upon a policy which England has always followed. Great Britain has ever maintained her supremacy by demanding recognition as a superior. In India, in South Africa, in Australia, wherever the Anglo-Saxon has gone in search of adventure and treasure, he has drawn the color line and has stood ready at all times to maintain it at the point of the sword. In America the early French explorer and settler won his foothold by intermarriage with the Indians; the Englishman treated the Indian as an inferior, and shouldered the white man's burden instead of trying to avoid it by a short cut across the matrimonial lots. It is interesting to note that the German colonial office has shown itself alive to the dangers to both races under the old system of mixed marriages in Samoa. Germany has at last realized that if there is to be a civilization in her colonial possessions it must be white.

How Americans, who should more keenly appreciate the danger of hybridization, can ever get their consent to policies that coquet with this horror I can not understand.

I suppose it must be because they are pushed on by greed. It is the love of money that is the root of all evil. Anxiety for trade impels them to take all risks and to do those things that can neither be justified in reason nor morals.

Black, brown, and yellow races have the same natural rights the white man has. The Lord who created them gave them a section of the earth for their own use and enjoyment, and they far outnumber the white races. For centuries they have not invaded the territory of the white man. The Turks are not now fighting a war of conquest on Italian soil, the East Indians have not invaded England, nor have the Filipinos threatened us.

They have a right to exist—at least we have no right to say they shall not—and certainly Americans can not with propriety suggest that they shall not have such political institutions, such forms of government, as they prefer. White men invade their countries in the name of the Christ who preached peace and charity, oppress them in the name of the Lord, and despoil them in the name of civilization. Cant and humbuggery have characterized our dealings with people of other races. Is it any wonder that they remain pagan?

Political mixing with alien people is as dangerous and unprofitable to the State as physical mixing is sinful and hurtful to us as a people.

It gratifies lust for power, it creates vassals, it enables us to employ the word "possessions" when speaking of Porto Rico and the Philippines, but it also increases the cost of government to the American taxpayers, and it has not increased their prosperity, individually or collectively. We imperil our own free institutions by imitating Imperial Rome when she dealt with colonies. With a fatuity that is really incomprehensible we, a free people, have been tempted to employ the tools of tyranny, and that can never be done without danger. Nations that live by the sword must perish by the sword.

"The Conflict of Color" is the title given to an epochal book by B. L. Putnam Weale. In that book he clearly shows the importance in numbers and power—the latter somewhat latent as yet—of the people who inhabit the vast continents of Asia and Africa. He also shows how there is a growing sentiment of hostility among Africans and Asiatics toward the white race. They have a dawning consciousness of injustice from Europe and America, and a community of interests is bringing them together.

The population of the earth, according to race, is given by statisticians as 1,510,150,000, of which there are, in round numbers, 690,000,000 whites and 820,150,000 black, brown, and yellow people. Who can believe that with this vast preponderance in favor of the colored races they will forever tamely submit to the rule of the alien white?

From the Cape of Good Hope to Gibraltar and throughout all of Asia they are suspicious and increasingly hostile. The actual shock of conflict may yet be remote, but it is inevitable. Now, what part shall we of the United States play in that great struggle? Is it necessary that we should have any part in it? Can we not, if we devote our energies to the development of continental America avoid it altogether?

If we apply the rules of conduct in governmental affairs laid down by the founders of this Republic, I think we can. In America we have plenty of land for homes, plenty of opportunities for the exercise of all our energy and talent. We need not take the political and personal risk of contact with the people of Asia and Africa. In homely phrase, we should stay at home and "mind" our own business and let the Filipinos and other Asiatics devise and operate their own schemes of government.

As to Africa, which is now being divided among the British, German, and French, we should certainly have nothing to do unless, perhaps, to negotiate for the purchase of territory to which the 10,000,000 or 12,000,000 Africans who are American born might be induced to emigrate. Then, indeed, could the ability of the black race be tested on a splendid scale.

The greatest, most menacing, and most insoluble problem that any people on earth ever faced is made by the presence in this country of 10,000,000 negroes. The Southern States, sometimes without the supporting sympathy of their brethren in the North, are doing their best to handle this great question with justice to the negro and safety to the whites.

The position of the white people of the South is taken for reasons that are deeper than politics or forms of government. Possibly the mass of the whites in the South could not analyze their position on this question, could not tell why they feel and think certain things. But they are just as certainly right as if they could frame their reasons in a perfect syllogism. It is from a higher cause than logic or economics; it is a manifestation of the natural struggle to keep the race pure. Let us hope that it can be done in peace and amity; let us hope that it can be done without injustice to anyone; but let no mistake be made about one thing—it is going to be done.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, the Republican platform of 1908 declared for citizenship for Porto Rico. [Applause.] Why do gentlemen on this floor who claim to be Republicans repudiate that plank of the national platform? The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], who has just addressed the House, says that the Porto Ricans can give the world no contribution to civilization. They were so civilized, I inform the gentleman, that more than a half century ago they voluntarily enfranchised all of the slaves in the island and paid their owners $30,000,000, raised by taxing themselves. [Applause.] What people has ever done anything nobler than that?

There is another and a controlling reason why the Porto Ricans should be made citizens of the United States. Under the Constitution we have no right to hold any people in subjection to our laws forever unless they are citizens. And we are going to hold Porto Rico forever. Why? Because we are never going to give up the Panama Canal, and therefore the geography of the situation makes it absolutely essential that we insist upon the permanent retention by the United States of the island of Porto Rico. We shall not let it go to any foreign power.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for one minute more.

Mr. COOPER. It is a compact island, about 90 miles by 40, whose inhabitants are so intelligent and so civilized that the monarchy of Spain permitted them to send representatives to each of the two branches of the Spanish Cortes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. May I ask the gentleman whether all the people of the island were entitled to the franchise?

Mr. COOPER. No; not all; but franchise and citizenship are entirely separate things.

The question we are now considering relates to Porto Rico. As to the retention of the Philippine Islands, that is another question not now before us.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. COOPER. I wish I might have two minutes more. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM].

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, I believe that a party, like an individual, must keep its promises. The individual who makes promises and breaks them is a man who can not be depended upon. A party that goes before the people and makes certain pledges and promises to the effect that if it is intrusted with power it will do certain things and then fails to carry those pledges and promises into execution can not long remain in power. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Democratic Party has pledged citizenship to the Porto Ricans, and it behooves the Democrats to make that promise good. To my mind this is an important act. Instead of standing here in this House and reprobating our neighbors to the south of us, we should make friends of them. We should cultivate the kindest relationship with them.

This little island of Porto Rico has sent here as its representatives men who will compare quite favorably with any man in this House. If they are treated fairly, and if we as Americans extend to them the blessings of citizenship, you will with this little island create an object lesson in the south sea islands that will win for this Government the everlasting gratitude, respect, and love of not only the people of Porto Rico, but also of the other islanders who should be our natural allies. [Applause.] It is in that zone that our trade can be developed and expanded. We should cultivate good relations with them instead of fomenting discord, as I am a little slow to charge it to be true in the case of Mexico. But the disturbances that are going on in Mexico, I am afraid, find their origin back in the United States, and I am sorry if that is true. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Six minutes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I am very much surprised that opposition to this measure should have come from two such distinguished gentlemen as the ex-Speaker of this House [Mr. CANNON] and the leader of the Republican side of the House [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Why does the gentleman say that? I did not say anything that was opposed to the measure. I pointed out some sections of the measure that apparently have never received the careful consideration of the gentleman, but I said I was not opposed to the measure.

Mr. JONES. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I drew the conclusion—and I think naturally—from the criticisms indulged in by the gentleman that he was opposed to it. I am glad to know that he is not opposed to it.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not make any criticisms of the bill at all.

Mr. JONES. Well, I did not mean to be understood as saying, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman criticized the form of the bill. The gentleman criticized the principle embodied in the bill.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did nothing of the sort.

Mr. JONES. I mean to say—

Mr. MANN. I decline to have that statement go unchallenged.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman contended that the people of Porto Rico would have more reason to ask for statehood if this bill were passed than they now have to ask for citizenship.

Mr. MANN. It is that a criticism of the bill?

Mr. JONES. That is a criticism, or, at least, I so understood it. I understood that the gentleman was opposed to the bill for the reason that if American citizenship was conferred upon the people of Porto Rico they would then ask for statehood, to which he was opposed. I am very glad to know that the gentleman does not oppose the bill.

I am very much surprised that the distinguished ex-Speaker of this House should oppose this bill.

If I remember aright the gentleman was a member of the last National Republican Convention; that he was a most influential member of a national convention of his party which unanimously declared it to be the purpose of the Republican Party to give collective citizenship to the people of Porto Rico. [Applause.] This bill is an honest expression of the purpose of the majority in this House to carry out the pledge contained in the Democratic platform to give the people of Porto Rico American citizenship. Both of the great political parties have declared themselves in favor of granting American citizenship to the people of Porto Rico, and, as I have said, the present Secretary of War in his last annual report strongly urged that this be done. I read from his report:

I think the time is arriving—

Said Mr. Secretary Stimson—

if it has not already arrived, when it is the part of honest and far-sighted statesmanship frankly to declare our position as to the ultimate interrelationship between the United States and Porto Rico, so far as it is possible to do so without unduly hampering the future in wisely dealing with this problem.

Then the Secretary proceeds to say in regard to the desire of the Porto Ricans for citizenship:

I believe the demand is just; that it is amply earned by sustained loyalty; and that it should be granted.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] did say, and I think he will not question this statement, that he seriously doubted the correctness of the legal proposition which I laid down—that the people of Porto Rico were already citizens of the United States.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt of it at all.

Mr. JONES. Although he questioned the correctness of that proposition, he did not discuss it. He did not undertake to point out why section 1891 of the Revised Statutes did not make the Porto Ricans citizens of the United States. The present attorney general of Porto Rico, who has given great thought and study to this subject, appeared before the Insular Affairs Committee and declared it to be his opinion that the people of Porto Rico were now citizens of the United States.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. If that be true, what is the necessity for this legislation?

Mr. JONES. The necessity for this legislation arises from the fact, as this report states, and as I have already stated, that the authorities in this country and in Porto Rico have not placed the interpretation upon section 1891 which has been placed upon it by the attorney general of Porto Rico and many other learned and eminent lawyers. Porto Rico, for some reason inexplicable to me, is not held to be an organized Territory within the meaning of section 1891 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 21094) to create a Commission on Industrial Relations, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Labor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules be discharged from the further consideration of House bill 21094, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Labor. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MORRIS AND CUMMINGS CHANNEL, TEX.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 19638) to authorize the San Antonio, Rockport & Mexican Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Morris and Cummings Channel.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the San Antonio, Rockport & Mexican Railway Co., a corporation incorporated under the laws of the State of Texas, and its assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Morris and Cummings Channel or Cut, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Shell Bank Island, where said channel passes between Shell Bank Island and Harbor Island, in the county of Nueces, in the State of Texas, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

Sec. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

There was no demand for a second.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSOURI RIVER, NEBR.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 20117) to authorize the Nebraska-Iowa Interstate Bridge Co. to construct a bridge across the Missouri River near Bellevue, Nebr.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Nebraska-Iowa Interstate Bridge Co., a corporation organized and doing business under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Nebraska, and its assigns, be, and are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Missouri River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Bellevue, Nebr., and near a point between the south line of section 31 and the north line of section 30, all in township 14 north, range 14 east of the sixth principal meridian, in the county of Sarpy, in the State of Nebraska, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

Sec. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

There was no demand for a second.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

DEFERRED PAYMENTS OF SETTLERS IN KIOWA AND COMANCHE CEDED LANDS IN OKLAHOMA.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 19863) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to subdivide and extend the deferred payments of settlers in the Kiowa-Comanche and Apache ceded lands in Oklahoma, with committee amendments.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to subdivide into two parts each of the deferred annual payments on lands heretofore sold and entered under the act entitled "An act to open to settlement 505,000 acres of land in the Kiowa-Comanche and Apache Indian Reservations in the State of Oklahoma," approved June 6, 1906, and the act entitled "An act giving preference rights to settlers on the Pasture Reserve No. 3 to purchase land leased to them for agricultural purposes in Comanche County, Okla.," approved June 28, 1906, and extend the time of payment one year from the date on which each payment so divided becomes due under existing law: Provided, That one of the parts into which each deferred annual payment is subdivided shall be paid annually thereafter until the entire amount due is paid, and that not more than one of such parts shall be required to be paid annually: Provided, That all interest due on such deferred payments on the date of the passage and approval of this act shall be added to the principal, become a part thereof, and, together with all deferred payments, bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum until paid: Provided further, That no patent or specie of title shall pass until all payments and interest are paid in full: And provided further, That full discretion is vested in the Secretary of the Interior to refuse an extension for fraud of the purchasers under the above-named acts.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MANN. I demand a second.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, in 1906 the Comanche, Kiowa, and Apache Reservations of 505,000 acres of land known as pasture reserve land in Oklahoma were opened for settlement. This land was sold to the highest bidder at public auction. At that time we had been favored with several years of excellent crops in that country. Railroads had recently been built through the reservations. At this time these lands were offered for sale at public auction to actual settlers only, requiring them to live on them and comply with the homestead laws; the price of the land was very high just at this time, and the lands sold for more than they should. Since the settlers bought the lands and went onto them and improved them and made one or more annual payments of the five payments the country had two or three years of drought; last year's drought was the worst in the history of that country. These settlers have made one or more payments on their lands and they can not make the payment this year, and would be forced to leave the country and give up their homes unless this relief is granted.

We provide in this bill that the deferred payments shall bear 4 per cent interest, that they may be subdivided into two payments, so that these men can this next year meet the payment out of the crops raised on their farms and thus save their homes and land.

Many of them paid out all of the money they had when they made the first payment and their settlement, and if they are now required to make further payment it will be impossible for them to do so, and it will be impossible to borrow the money from the banks or the trust companies, because they have no title to their lands, and the further fact that we have had several crop failures and money could not be borrowed by these settlers in the money market in that country.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will.

Mr. BUTLER. Can it be possible that the land has depreciated so in value down to a level where they can not borrow enough to make these payments?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. They are not seeking to sell the land, but to save it from forfeiture. They have as yet no title to the land, hence they can not raise money by mortgaging it.

Mr. BUTLER. I understood the gentleman to say that by reason of the failure of the crops the land had depreciated to such a level that it would be impossible to borrow the money.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. This land is not worth as much as it was when it was purchased. It would not bring as high a price now as it sold for in 1896.

Mr. BUTLER. So the Indian would be better off if he could get the balance of his money?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes; but the settlers would lose several years' work on their farms and the payments already made for the land, and that would be a great hardship on these pioneer settlers.

Mr. BUTLER. If the land has depreciated in value, if the Indian took it back he would lose?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No; the Indians would get the land back and the improvements that the white men have put upon it.

Mr. BUTLER. I understood the gentleman to say it would be impossible for these people to borrow enough money to make the payments.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], who is perfectly familiar with this subject, as he is the author of the bill and these lands are in his district.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania asks a pertinent question. This land if reoffered to-day probably would not bring as much as it did when it was sold. Those who purchased the land as a homestead settled there; they purchased at the highest bid, and in addition they homesteaded it and paid one-fifth down. Some have paid two and some three and some four payments. Some have two or three and some have four payments remaining. This merely subdivides the payments, each time making them pay interest and each time withholding the title until every payment is made, in order to let the homesteader stay on a little longer. I want to say one word further. The Congress of the United States has been very generous to these people. It has given them extensions before; but I will say, however, that it has never been at the sacrifice of the Indian. The settler has been paying interest. Every bill that has extended the time has required the payment of interest, and every bill has provided for withholding title until all payments were made. It is simply tiding these settlers over the severe drought and hard times we have had for the last three or four years.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma a question. I am in sympathy with the purpose of the bill. Let me ask the gentleman a few questions. It looks as if there ought to be an amendment to the bill.

Mr. FERRIS. Perhaps so.

Mr. MANN. It is first proposed to subdivide each of the existing payments into two parts, the purpose being to have those payments, as divided into two parts, made one each year. In other words, if there were three payments now due, it is proposed to make six payments, due one each year.

Mr. FERRIS. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. But the bill provides, on page 2, line 4, after providing for dividing the payments—

And extend the time of payment one year from the date on which each payment so divided becomes due under existing law.

But the gentleman desires to extend the time more than one year.

Mr. FERRIS. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I was not on the subcommittee that had to do with the consideration of this bill.

Mr. MANN. I think the words "one year" ought to be stricken out.

Mr. FERRIS. What effect will it have to strike out those words?

Mr. MANN. And leave it read:

And extend the time of payment from the date on which each payment so divided becomes due under existing law—without specifying how long a time you extend it, because it is provided by law that one of these divided payments shall be made each year.

Mr. FERRIS. I think the gentleman is entirely right about that. The only thing I sought to do and the only thing the committee sought to do was to divide those payments into two parts so that the settler could pay them.

Mr. MANN. But you extend it more than one year.

Mr. FERRIS. We have not intended to do it.

Mr. MANN. Here are three payments now due—one this year, one next year, and one in 1914—but the committee wishes to make that one this year, one in 1913, one in 1914, one in 1915, one in 1916, and one in 1917.

Mr. FERRIS. Precisely.

Mr. MANN. That is extending them more than one year.

Mr. FERRIS. It is first dividing the payments into two parts.

Mr. MANN. But the bill provides for extending them one year under existing law, and these payments are due at this time, whether divided or undivided.

Mr. FERRIS. There is only one of the payments that is due at this time.

Mr. MANN. I understand; but that is under existing law.

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And you want to extend the time more than one year.

Mr. FERRIS. We want to extend the time of the first payment, and each succeeding payment one year.

Mr. MANN. More than one year.

Mr. FERRIS. Each succeeding payment.

Mr. MANN. Only one year from the time it becomes due.

Mr. FERRIS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. But here is a payment due in 1912. You desire to divide that into two payments and pay half of it this year and half the next year; but the payment that under existing law will be due next year you desire to divide into two parts and make one part payable in 1914 and one in 1915.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman five minutes more. That can be corrected by simply striking out those words "one year," in line 4, page 2, I think.

Mr. FERRIS. And what effect will that have? That will still let one be paid each year.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; and will extend the time of the latter payment more than a year, as is necessary in order to make the new payments payable one each year.

Mr. FERRIS. I have no objection to that, and if the verbiage should be changed I hope the gentleman will offer an amendment so to do.

Mr. MANN. But it is not subject to an amendment.

Mr. FERRIS. We can do that by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Illinois be permitted at this time to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] be permitted to offer an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to interrogate the gentleman from Oklahoma a moment. Is the gentleman quite sure that that amendment will accomplish what was desired by the bill?

Mr. FERRIS. I was trusting implicitly in the unusually good judgment and vigilance of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], whom I have always found to be correct on those matters.

Mr. MANN. It is perfectly patent that it will, I think.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The department in making report upon the bill called attention to the fact that the bill in its present form would probably not accomplish what was desired and suggested the proviso that appears in lines 6 to 10.

Mr. MANN. That will be left in the bill.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. You leave that in the bill?

Mr. MANN. Surely.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Is the amendment to strike out "one year"?

Mr. MANN. Yes; in line 4, page 2.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. And then it will read "extend the time of payment one year from the date on which each payment so divided becomes due under existing law"?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Extended how long?

Mr. MANN. The proviso fixes how long. First you extend the proviso, and then the proviso is "that one of the parts into which each deferred annual payment is subdivided shall be paid annually thereafter until the entire amount due is paid."

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the amendment, but I want to be sure that the bill would accomplish what was desired, because it is a measure that ought to be enacted.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the gentleman from Oklahoma a question?

Mr. FERRIS. Let us dispose of this amendment first. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that one of these payments now due could not be made—

Mr. FERRIS. That is true.

Mr. BUTLER (continuing). By these settlers. It is proposed to extend the first payment and the next payment which becomes due next year?

Mr. FERRIS. The idea was to extend each one one year ahead, first dividing them into two parts, which is really more than that, and let one-half the payment come due next year and one-half each succeeding year.

Mr. BUTLER. Then you do not propose to make the balance in two payments?

Mr. FERRIS. No; that would be impossible for the settler to make, but we are trying to fix it in a way so that it would be possible for the settler.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. So as to avoid having to legislate next year and the year after that.

Mr. BUTLER. Let me ask the gentleman another question? What is the rate of interest in Oklahoma?

Mr. FERRIS. The legal rate of interest is 10 per cent.

Mr. BUTLER. What are you going to pay the Indians?

Mr. FERRIS. The same as are paid on funds in the Treasury, 4 per cent. If funds were paid in and deposited in the Treasury of the United States the Government of the United States would pay the Indians 4 per cent.

Mr. BUTLER. Then in Oklahoma you have two rules for the payment of interest, one to the white man and the other for the Indians.

Mr. FERRIS. These moneys if paid in would not be available for the Indians, but would be deposited in the Treasury and become public funds, and we pay the same rate of interest the Government would pay the Indians if they were deposited in the Treasury. It merely substitutes the payment by the settlers for the payment by the Government.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from Illinois offering an amendment?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to offer an amendment. I ask unanimous consent that the motion of the gentleman to suspend the rules and pass the bill be so modified as to strike out, on page 2, line 4, the words "one year."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 4, strike out the words "one year."

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, his motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SALE OF CERTAIN LANDS, PORT ANGELES, WASH.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WARBURTON].

Mr. WARBURTON. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill, S. 339.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 339) providing for the reappraisal and sale of certain lands in the town site of Port Angeles, Wash., and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause the reappraisal at their actual cash value of blocks Nos. 32 and 53, and the west 450 feet of suburban lot No. 26, in the Government town site of Port Angeles, or any subdivisions thereof, in the State of Washington, and all of said lands, not required for the use of the Government, so reappraised to be subject to sale at not less than the reappraised price, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe: Provided, however, That any settler who, prior to January 1, 1910, was in actual occupation of any portion or subdivision of such lands in good faith for town-site purposes shall be entitled to a patent for the lands so occupied and to own the buildings and improvements thereon upon payment to the Government of the appraised value of the land, not taking into consideration the value of any buildings and improvements thereon: And provided further, That the right of any such actual settler must be exercised within 90 days after the reappraisal herein provided for shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior: And provided further, That any such settler not exercising the right herein granted shall have the right for a period of 30 days after the expiration of said 90 days to remove his buildings from said premises occupied by him.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma has 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Illinois has 20 minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, during Abraham Lincoln's administration a certain portion of land was withdrawn in the town of Port Angeles, Wash. Some two years ago Congress passed an act providing for the sale of part of that land. There is yet remaining two blocks and a fractional part of a block, for which this bill provides a sale. The bill as introduced provided for the sale at the actual appraised price. The subcommittee which had it in charge—and later it was adopted by the full committee—provided that it should be appraised at actual cash value and it should be sold at not less than the appraised price.

Mr. BUTLER. Why did you not sell it at public sale?

Mr. FERRIS. Well, that was talked of; and the reason we did not provide for that was this: The land is practically all occupied by settlers. The land has been vacant there and unused ever since President Lincoln's administration, and equities and rights have attached by reason of their improvements and their occupancy, until we felt that we would have accomplished everything that was necessary to accomplish if we provided for the appraisement at the actual cash value. And the committee, feeling as they did about it, with the amendment suggested, we recommended that it be passed to the full committee, and it was adopted unanimously.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I understand the purpose of this bill is to take care of both the Government and the settler.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not know what construction the gentleman may put upon it, but the bill provides for the sale at the actual cash value, pursuant to an appraisement had by the Federal Government, under which the Secretary of the Interior has full supervision, and it was our idea that the Secretary would see to it that this land brought all that it was worth and all it was entitled to, and we could not imagine any objectionable features to allowing the Secretary to appraise it, sell it, and dispose of it in this way.

Mr. BUTLER. But the gentleman would not be in favor of selling land that belonged to the Government at an appraised value, unless it was that somebody had an interest in it somewhere and the purpose of which was to protect the interests of the squatter or individual upon it.

Mr. FERRIS. Well, there are two ways of selling property—one by appraisement and one by public auction. There are instances where one works out more advantageously than the other, and vice versa.

Mr. BUTLER. Is not the common, ordinary way to sell it at public sale?

Mr. FERRIS. I think that the contrary is true where the settlers' rights have attached. It is almost universally true that they sell them pursuant to an appraisement fixed by the Federal Government, and there are no strings to the appraisement. The Secretary can go out there to determine its value and has full latitude to place any restrictions around the sale which he desires.

Mr. BUTLER. When the settler moved onto this property he knew that it belonged to the Government and that he had no right to it.

Mr. FERRIS. Undoubtedly that is true. But on that particular question I wish to yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WARBURTON], who lives in that State and knows more of the details than I do.

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Speaker, as it has been stated by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], this was, I think, the only town site created by the Government in the State of Washington. The land was surveyed into lots and blocks. It was put on the market a part at a time. It was not all put on the market for sale. When the town site was platted, a number of settlers went onto the particular blocks mentioned in the bill, supposing that they would be sold. However, the Government reserved the lots from sale, and the settlers went on the lots supposing the same would be sold, but they were withdrawn from sale. It is not the settlers on this public land who are seeking the passage of this bill. It is the city of Port Angeles. The blocks reserved in the town site of Port Angeles are right in the center of the city. The city is situated like this: There is a little space of land down beneath a very high bluff, about large enough for the business portion of the town. The residence portion, including this land, stands 150 feet above the Strait of Juan de Fuca. These blocks are in the center of the residence portion of the city. The little town has about 2,500 people. All of the improvements of their streets and alleys are made by local assessments, and these 10 acres are grown up with brush, with no streets through them, have remained there for 40 years, and will remain there for 40 years longer unless some such law as this is passed.

In order to build the necessary streets and alleys of the city and make the necessary city improvements the people of Port Angeles have sought the sale of this land. The land as proposed to be sold now will be sold exactly as the original town site was sold. There is no question about the Government getting the full value of the land. We have provided for that. The settler will pay the full value. I imagine, or at least they inform me, that it will bring the Government about $25,000 to $30,000. That is all that the land is worth.

What we are most anxious about, while we do not want to do any injustice to the settlers, is permission to open up the streets. You can imagine the condition of a city of this size with 10 acres right in the heart of the city and the people not able to construct a street or alley through it.

Mr. BUTLER. Is that the reason why the land is to be sold at the appraised value—to protect the settlers?

Mr. WARBURTON. That is the provision. For instance, there are some homes there, as I am informed, worth about $1,000. It is to prevent somebody from coming in there from the outside and bidding on that land and running it up way above the value of the lot and make the settler, in order to save his house, pay more for the lot than it is worth.

Mr. BUTLER. I am a conservationist, and I would like to know whether or not this property would not bring more to the Government if it were put up at public sale. From the statement of the gentleman from Washington I would infer that it would.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not think it would be the desire on the part of the gentleman from Washington. It is his object to prevent an outsider from bidding for a lot and improvements more than the lot is worth. It is to prevent speculators from speculating on improvements on it that are not movable, and which improvements belong to the settler.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not proposing to run up the price on the little homes. I am looking after the interests of the Government. There has been a good deal of complaint that the public lands have been wasted and the property sold without receiving full value therefor. I am convinced that if the property here were put up at public sale it would bring more money than it would by selling it at the appraised value.

Mr. FERRIS. The bill provides that the Interior Department shall have full latitude to place an actual cash value on these two and one-half blocks. If that is true, why is it necessary to assume that the Secretary of the Interior will not do his full duty and get from it all that the land is worth?

Mr. BUTLER. I assume that he will do his full duty under the law. But as I understand the gentleman from Washington, some of these little houses are worth $1,000 apiece. He says further that if this land is sold at the appraised value intruders may be prevented from coming in and bidding up the property at the sale.

Mr. WARBURTON. I said that this bill provides, say, where a man has built a house worth $500 on a little bit of land worth, say, $300, it would not be advisable to allow an outsider to come in and bid $800 on it and thus deprive the settler of the value of his improvements.

Mr. BUTLER. I know that. But let the public understand that all of us who are protecting the Government are about to permit the sale of land under certain restrictions that would bring more to the Government if it were put up at public sale.

Mr. WARBURTON. I want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I do not believe this land will bring one dollar more than the appraised value if offered at public auction.

Mr. BUTLER. Then why not put these lots up at public sale?

Mr. WARBURTON. Because it will not work out that way. The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the rules be suspended and the bill passed?

The question was taken; and, in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

ELECTION OF COMMITTEE MEMBERS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent to place in nomination a gentleman on that side of the House for election to a place on a committee of the House and a gentleman on this side to two places.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent to place in nomination certain gentlemen for places on committees. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move the election of Mr. CARL HAYDEN to a vacancy on the Committee on Indian Affairs and to a vacancy on the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, and by another motion I desire to move the election of Mr. GEORGE CURRY to a place on the Committee on Arid Lands.

The SPEAKER. Are there any other nominations? The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] moves to elect the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] to the Committee on Indian Affairs and the Committee on Arid Lands and the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. CURRY] to the Committee on Arid Lands. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS—JAMES MARSH.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. SWITZER, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of James Marsh (H. R. 3873), first session Sixty-second Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. RICHARDSON, indefinitely, from March 6.

To Mr. CLINE, for three days, on account of important business.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE IN CONVICT-MADE GOODS.

Mr. HENSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to discharge the Committee on Labor from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5601) to limit the effect of the regulation of interstate commerce between the States in goods, wares, and merchandise wholly or in part manufactured by convict labor or in any prison or reformatory, and to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HENSLEY] moves that the Committee on Labor be discharged from the further consideration of House bill 5601, and that the rules be suspended and the bill passed. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured wholly or in part by convict labor, or in any prison or reformatory, transported into any State or Territory or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage, shall, upon arrival and delivery in such State or Territory, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory to the same extent and in the same manner as though such goods, wares, and merchandise had been manufactured in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced in original packages or otherwise.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MANN. Unless some one opposing the bill demands a second, I will ask for a second.

Mr. HENSLEY. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. COVINGTON. I object.

Mr. MANN. This request is only that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. COVINGTON. I withdraw my objection to that request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HENSLEY] is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to 20 minutes.

Mr. HENSLEY. Mr. Speaker, this bill seeks to regulate interstate commerce between the States. When convict-made goods go from the State where they are made into another State this bill provides that they shall become subject to the law of the State which they enter. It seems to me there is no question about the merits of the bill, and that it ought to be passed.

We have something like 160,000 to 200,000 convicts engaged in making different articles of consumption in the prisons throughout our country, and when those prison-made goods go from the State where they are made into another State this bill requires that they become subject to the law of that State. I was selected by the Labor Committee to submit a report on this bill, which is in part as follows:

There are a number of States in the Union which forbid by statute the placing on sale of articles of commerce made by the inmates of the penal institution of the State. It is probable that other States would enact similar laws were it not for the knowledge that such legislation would be nullified by the sale of prison-made goods brought in from neighboring States having no restriction as to the ultimate destination of their output. The manufacturers look upon the competition of prison-made goods from other States as a special grievance. In some of the States the manufacturing and labor interests have secured the enactment of laws prohibiting the manufacture, within the prisons of the State, of goods to be sold in competition with the product of free labor, and requiring that the goods made be for public use only. In such cases it is regarded as a peculiar hardship that convict-made goods from other States may be brought into the State and sold without restriction, thereby displacing free labor.

The purpose of this bill is to give needed protection to those States that have declared themselves as opposed to the traffic in convict-made goods as well as those which have prescribed the kind of goods of that category that can be sold within the State or the conditions under which the sales can be made.

This bill does not attempt to place any limitation upon the rights of the several States to employ their convicts in productive effort. The convict product as a whole is very small when compared with the entire product of free labor in the United States, but the employers of free labor and their workmen unite in affirming that when any convict-made product is placed in competition with the product of free labor the market becomes demoralized, even a small sale affecting prices far out of proportion to the amount of the sale. Every State objects to being made the market for convict-made goods produced in other States. And reviewing the general question of convict labor as a competitive factor, it may be said that manufacturers consider such competition unfair and ruinous, demoralizing to markets and business stability, compelling the reduction of prices below a fair margin of profit and often even below the cost of production. Wages are forced to the lowest limit in a vain effort to lower the cost of production to that of the prison contractor, until in some cases it has resulted in a deterioration of quality of material used and in others an entire abandonment to the prisons of the manufacture of certain grades of goods.

Those States which have no restrictive laws in regard to the sale of prison-made goods will be in no wise affected by the legislation here proposed, while all that seek to interdict such sale within its own boundaries or which insist upon distinguishing labels or standards of quality will be furnished the protection of which they stand in dire need.

The effect of prison-made goods on business can not be arrived at by any calculation of percentages, but it is safe to say that this competition is most severely felt by a class least able to bear it.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. HENSLEY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I see this bill provides—that all goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured wholly or in part by convict labor, or in any prison or reformatory, transported into any State or Territory or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage, shall, upon arrival and delivery in such State or Territory, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory to the same extent—as the State law applies to convict-made goods manufactured within that State.

As I understand the bill, the interstate commerce is complete by delivery of the goods. That is, the commerce among the States is complete before the convict-made goods which come into the State become subject to the law of that State.

Mr. HENSLEY. The interstate commerce becomes complete by delivery to the consignee.

Mr. CANNON. By delivery to the consignee, and then the State law attaches.

Mr. HENSLEY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. It seems to me that the State law would attach without this legislation.

Mr. HENSLEY. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that some do make the argument that the State laws will attach, but the study I have made of the subject convinces me that perhaps the State law does not attach in all instances.

Mr. CANNON. I doubt very much whether it is in the power of Congress to make police regulations for a State. The only power we have is to regulate commerce among the States. I see no objection to the enactment of the bill, but I did want to make this remark in connection with the consideration, namely, that the commerce begins in one State and ceases in the other by delivery to the consignee. It is plain to me that under the police powers of the State they could make any regulation they choose touching the product found there, the interstate commerce having been accomplished. With that explanation I have no objection to the bill as far as I am concerned.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, replying to the gentleman from Illinois, if the gentleman from Missouri will permit, I think the gentleman from Illinois is mistaken. I think the power of Congress attaches to the article that is a part of interstate commerce as long as it is in the original package to the extent that the consignee may dispose of it even after arrival in the State. It has been quite a long time since I have had occasion to investigate the matter, but my recollection is that it was in the case of Brown against Maryland, quite a number of years ago, the court held that the article might not only be shipped into the State and delivered to the consignee, but as long as it was in the original package it would not be subject to the laws of the State.

So in the Wilson bill it was attempted, as the gentleman remembers, to withdraw the power of Congress from interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors and to provide that upon arrival in the State the liquor would be subject to the police power of the State.

Mr. CANNON. And delivered.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No; the court read that into it, as I remember it. The court, as I recollect, held that that "arrival" in the statute meant upon arrival and delivery. Now, this bill proposes, following the exact language of the court, that after it arrives and is delivered, although it be in the original package, Congress will permit the States to step in with their police powers, notwithstanding the original package, and say that they will forbid the sale after the delivery.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman from Missouri will allow me, we are taking a good deal of his time—

Mr. HENSLEY. That is all right.

Mr. CANNON. I recollect the decision of the court which the gentleman refers to, and also the enactment of the Wilson law. The decision of the court was that the original package was not subject to State regulation until it was sold, but the court held, as I recollect, that when the act of commerce from one State to another was completed by delivery to the consignee in the State to which the shipment was made, that then under that legislation the State had the right under the police powers of the State to seize it, whether it was in the original package or not.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No; if it was in the original package they could sell it. Now, this bill withdraws that limitation and permits the police powers of the State to apply before the sale, and to begin to apply upon the delivery of the goods to the consignee, notwithstanding they are in the original package. Of course, if the original package is destroyed then the State law would attach at once, but this will permit it to attach even if it is in the original package.

Mr. CANNON. I understand it is so in the Wilson law, but so that I may not be misunderstood I want to say that convict-made goods made in Illinois, for instance, and shipped into Iowa could not be seized the moment that they crossed the dividing line between Iowa and Illinois, but they must proceed to the consignee and be delivered to the consignee, and then they are subject to the police laws of the State itself, and subject to seizure, or any other disposition that the State may desire to provide.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Not until an act of Congress says that. As long as it is in the original package it can not be seized. The purpose of this bill is to enable the power of the State to attach, although it may be in the original package.

Mr. KENDALL. It is to enable the State of Iowa to legislate on the subject respecting the shipment from Illinois into that State whenever it reaches Iowa in the original package.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Without this legislation I think the power of the State would not apply.

Mr. KENDALL. Without this legislation the State of Iowa would not have any authority to enact the legislation.

Mr. AUSTIN. If the gentleman will allow me, I would like to inquire if this bill would cover convict-mined coal? Our State is very much interested in that subject, because they are using the State convicts to mine coal and selling it in competition with coal mined by miners.

Mr. HENSLEY. I do not think the language of this bill would permit it to be applied to coal at all.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman state why? The bill says "all goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured wholly or in part." Does not the gentleman think the application of labor to the raw material of coal is in a sense manufactured goods?

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. HENSLEY. I would like very much to have it so apply.

Mr. KENDALL. I am very much in sympathy with this legislation, but I should like to see it perfected to make it apply to the situation suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman modify his original request so as to insert the words "or produced"?

Mr. HENSLEY. On that proposition I would have to confer with the author of the bill.

Mr. AUSTIN. If the gentleman would accept the word "coal," I think it would be satisfactory. If not, I should have to object to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. KENDALL. The purpose of this committee is to formulate legislation which will give the respective States the right to control where convict goods are sought to be brought into competition with goods produced by free labor, and it is a very laudable purpose, as I view it. What we on this side are seeking to do by suggestions that have been advanced is this: The gentleman has provided here that all goods, wares, merchandise, manufactured wholly or in part by convict labor, shall, upon the entrance into a given State, be subject to the legislation of that State, and what we want to do is to extend this provision to include coal that may be mined by convict miners.

Mr. BOOHER. Why include coal? That is not a manufactured article.

Mr. KENDALL. It is produced, and it is the result of labor that has been applied to it. There is no more reason why a garden tool made by a convict laborer in Illinois should become subject to legislation in Iowa than there is why coal mined by convict labor in Tennessee should become so subject to legislation in Iowa.

Mr. BOOHER. I think there is all the difference in the world. Nobody ought to prevent people from getting coal. It is a necessary thing, and all people need it in the winter time. We all have to burn it in cold weather.

Mr. KENDALL. Coal is no more of a commodity than clothes.

Mr. BOOHER. That is true, but it is of a different character, and the labor upon it is of a different kind. It is used in different ways.

Mr. KENDALL. The gentleman does not mean to say there is any difference in the quality of labor applied to the making of garden tools than there is in the mining of coal?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes; there is. This bill is to apply to manufactured goods, such as clothing, overalls, and boots and shoes. The garment industry gives employment to women and girls of the working class and gives fair remuneration for their labor. They do not mine coal. It is to prevent that class of people being placed in competition with convict labor. I am for the protection of free labor.

Mr. KENDALL. I am not quarreling with the gentleman from Missouri on that proposition, but I see no reason why, if we are to extend the provisions of this bill to include the people engaged in the manufacture of overalls—and I am in favor of that—why we should not also extend it to include the men who are engaged in mining coal.

Mr. AUSTIN. Or cutting lumber.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENSLEY. Yes.

Mr. BOWMAN. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill whether there would be any more reason for permitting coal produced by free labor to compete with coal produced by convict labor or the reverse?

Mr. HENSLEY. I am forced to say to the gentleman that so far as I am concerned I would like very much to accept the amendments, but I must defer to the gentleman who introduced the bill upon that proposition.

Mr. COOPER. Would the gentleman agree to this amendment:

That all goods, wares, merchandise, manufactured, produced, or mined, wholly or in part—

And so forth?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. He said he would not.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, let me make this suggestion to the gentleman, that there would be no objection to the sale of coal mined by convicts unless the legislature of the State into which it is shipped should choose to impose some burden upon it; so that we leave it at last to the States, and if the States are in favor of cheap coal, they do not have to pass any legislation, although we give them the power to do it, and therefore I can see no special objection to it. In my State they work the convicts very largely on cotton plantations, and this would affect that, because any State that wanted to could impose a burden on the cotton that is so produced. This legislation does not impose the burden. It is left at last to the State. Personally I believe the convicts could be much better employed in building good roads than in producing cotton or working in the coal mines.

Mr. BOOHER. This bill refers only to manufactured goods. It does not pretend to touch coal, lumber, or anything else, and, so far as I am concerned, I shall not oppose putting any amendment to the bill that will protect free labor from competition of cheap convict labor. The place to work convicts is on our roads and highways.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes.

Mr. WILLIS. The object of this bill, I understand, is to protect free labor against convict labor. Now, why is it not just as desirable to protect the free labor that is at work in the mine as it is to protect the free labor that is at work in a factory? The principle of the thing is the same.

Mr. BOOHER. I agree with the gentleman. There is no difference in principle.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the first bill that is on the Calendar of Motions to Discharge Committees is a bill introduced by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER], placed upon the Calendar of Motions to Discharge Committees by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE], which is identical to the bill now under consideration, so that if the Discharge Calendar has done nothing else it has forced that side of the House to report a bill for passage on this convict-labor-goods proposition, and my only regret is that the gentlemen are not willing to agree to a proposition to include mines—

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. When I finish this statement I will. I do not propose to carry on the same sort of burlesque that has been carried on here. I will withdraw the word "burlesque"; I do not mean it that way, and will say opera bouffe. Mr. Speaker, so far as we have the power to control the shipment of convict-made goods from one State to another to prevent competition of convict-made goods with goods made by free labor, I am in favor of exercising the power. I shall vote for this bill, but with some regrets that it has not been examined more carefully as to its constitutionality. It follows the law with reference to the shipment of liquors into the States, and because the law that it follows concerning liquors was held to be constitutional, therefore they assume that this bill is constitutional. Liquor is an article that has to be judged by itself. How can you judge coal as to whether it is made by convict labor or by free labor by viewing the coal? How can you judge of boots and shoes, unless they are labeled as to how they are made, when you come to apply the law of a State? It is a question, in my judgment, as to whether this is a proper way or the only way in which you can get at the evil. But it is true that certain penitentiaries of the country are now engaged in the making of certain classes of products for the purpose, in the main, of shipping them out of the State. That is especially true of binding twine and especially true of boots and shoes and especially true of a number of other classes of goods where they are shipping them into other States for the purpose of coming into competition with free labor. We all know it is quite desirable that convicts in penitentiaries shall have something provided for them to do. They can not remain in idleness under any humanitarian form of government; but when they go into the manufacture of goods that come in competition with free labor it means the depreciation of price, it means in that case precisely the same thing that the importations under a cheap tariff means, that goods are brought in from a foreign country to compete with the goods made by free labor here, and there is no distinction in principle between making the transportation of convict-made goods free in this country and making the bringing in of foreign-made goods free to enter in competition with our own goods. [Applause on the Republican side.] I am opposed to both propositions and in favor, as far as possible, of upholding—

Mr. BATES. The dignity of labor.

Mr. MANN. As my friend from Pennsylvania suggests, the dignity of labor, but the dignity of labor is very little satisfaction to the man who labors unless he sees a reward for his labor which permits to live in happiness and comfort. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I ask this for information. Is not it the law now that convict-made goods have to be labeled as such before they enter into interstate commerce?

Mr. BOOHER. I will say that some of the States have that kind of a law, but very few.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I want to know if we have not such a law of the United States in regard to that?

Mr. MANN. I do not recall it.

Mr. WILLIS. There is a law of some States which requires the goods to be branded before they can be carried from one State to another.

Mr. HENSLEY. I will say to the gentleman, if he will permit, there are four or five States that have regulations of that character that require convict-made goods to be branded as such before they enter into interstate commerce.

Mr. MANN. I will say this, Mr. Speaker: Take a railroad company that is engaged in the transportation business; we have had numerous attempts to penalize a railroad company if they accepted certain classes of goods.

It is perfectly patent to the simplest mind that the railroad official who accepts the goods—the railroad agent—can not be expected to trace the goods back to their origin and can not know, unless the goods show on their face, what these goods are or where they come from. And all attempts to make penalties of that sort have failed to be enacted into law up to date, I think, simply because of the manifest impossibility.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 13 minutes remaining.

Mr. MANN. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I have a peculiar and rather personal interest in this bill. When I came to Congress in the spring of 1897, I was very much impressed with the importance of doing something to prevent the transportation of convict-made goods from one State to another to compete with goods made by free labor. After struggling with prentice hands, I wrote a bill, which is this bill, with the exception of two words. I forgot that reformatories were penal institutions. In either the last session of the Fifty-fifth Congress or the first, perhaps, of the Fifty-sixth Congress, a bill was reported from the Committee on Labor by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER], which was precisely like the bill that I had offered in the same Congress, except it had the words "or reformatories" added. The bill of the gentleman from New Jersey was passed by the House, but did not become a law. In the next Congress I reintroduced the bill, and on that occasion I "took," as territory has been taken in time, Mr. GARDNER's words "or reformatories." And in four or five subsequent Congresses I introduced precisely this same bill. I did so because, as I say, I had a keen interest in free labor and wanted to prevent the competition of convicts. I may say also that I was not beyond the temptation of trying to do something that would make the labor vote friendly.

But it was a just and proper measure. And, looking still further afield, I wanted to compel States that used penal slaves for the manufacture of goods to consume their own products. I wanted all States forced finally to the putting of their convicts upon the highways, where they would compete less with honest workmen and do more good to the community at large. [Applause.]

Among the convict-made goods that were coming into the State of Texas, when I was first elected to Congress, and doing great harm to the free labor of that State were boots and shoes made in prisons in the State of Missouri, and that was the particular and glaring instance that I had in mind when I drafted my first bill.

I am heartily in favor of the idea. I hope that the bill will pass. I sincerely hope that it will be found constitutional; I hope it will accomplish the purpose which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] has in mind; and that it will relieve honest free labor from the competition of penal slaves. I hope, and I believe, that, without any amendment, this bill, with the language that it now carries, will protect honest miners against the competition of penal slaves in coal or other productions. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps some explanation of my objection to this bill when it was on the Unanimous Consent Calendar is due the House. I do not know whether this bill is a good one or not. I have very serious doubts as to whether many Members in the House know that. But I was very positive of one thing—that a bill involving a constitutional question, a bill involving investments of a great many of the States in twine plants and in various other manufacturing establishments, in which convicts are employed, ought not to be brought up here on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. My purpose in objecting to its consideration on that calendar was that I desired to give notice that that calendar must be preserved for the motions and bills which ought properly to come up under it. This bill ought to be considered upon a calendar where we could have ample opportunity for debate. It ought not to be brought up here by unanimous consent. It ought not to be brought up here on a motion to suspend the rules and pass it, as it is now. I have no objection to the bill, so far as I know, but I would like to see a reasonable opportunity for debate in an orderly manner.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, we have had in my State—Tennessee—and especially in the eastern end of it, convict labor in the mines for about 30 or 40 years. We have about 1,500 convicts mining coal and about a thousand within the walls of the penitentiary in the various manufacturing plants. Every dollar's worth of convict coal and every article manufactured in the prison shops come in direct competition with the same articles produced by free or honest labor. This bill seeks to give relief to those men who are engaged in the manufacturing lines, and if there is a class of people that need and deserve relief along these lines it is the men who work in the coal mines and who are engaged in a hazardous employment.

Now, when the last panic was on, known generally as the "Roosevelt panic" [laughter], we had 5,000 free miners, honest miners, walking the camps daily without employment for months. In that campaign I went into a mining camp where they had three days' labor in three months, but right over at Brushy Mountain, where the State of Tennessee, to its disgrace and shame, was employing 1,500 convict miners, these convicts were working every day except Sundays. And when the railroads in Georgia invited bids for their annual supply of fuel in competition with the bids of men who represented companies that were giving employment to honest, law-abiding miners, who had families to support and who bore the burdens and responsibilities of citizenship, the State of Tennessee's bid was far below the bid of any private corporation, and as a result during those trying times the convict miners of Tennessee were always busy, while the honest, law-abiding miners were walking the streets of the mining villages hungry, and their families were in need and their children were barefooted, and many even unable to attend the public schools.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. AUSTIN. I do.

Mr. BOOHER. Whose panic did I understand the gentleman to say was the panic of 1907? [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. AUSTIN. I said the so-called Roosevelt panic, named after a candidate that the Democrats seem very anxious that our party shall select at Chicago, but whom we do not propose to nominate. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; I will, if there is not any dinner pail in it. [Laughter.]

Mr. AKIN of New York. I desire to ask the gentleman if the dinner pail during the Roosevelt administration was not a little larger than it is now under the present administration?

Mr. AUSTIN. I only know that the dinner pail was not reduced in size until the Republican Party lost control of this House and the tariff campaign of the gentlemen on the other side began. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES].

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to see the time arrive when the House of Representatives gets an opportunity to pass upon this particular piece of legislation. Since I first came here I have been engaged in an effort to get this bill before the House for consideration. Up to this time, by one means or another, it has been possible to prevent it.

I do not suppose that there are many Members of the House who know how generally the convict-made goods enter into the affairs of the people of this Nation. I know I was almost horror-stricken to find at one time that the United States Government itself was trafficking in convict-made goods, and was buying mail bags from the penitentiary of the State of New Jersey, and had been doing it so long that the people who were engaged in that business in private enterprise had been driven out of it by the convicts of the State penitentiary doing work for the Government of the United States. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, have I two minutes remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has three minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON] one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON] is recognized for one minute.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, I am in hearty accord with all that has been said about this bill by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. I am heartily in favor of the bill and the object that is sought to be obtained by it, and I shall vote for it. But I have very grave doubts as to its constitutionality.

I have always believed that the power of Congress over interstate commerce was supreme, and if it is, this bill is constitutional. If I had been going to draft the bill, I should have said that these commodities should have the protection of interstate shipments removed from them. I would have sought to remove the interstate character of the shipments. I believe that kind of a law would be constitutional, provided Congress has the power to do that upon all commodities. The courts have sustained laws removing the interstate character of intoxicating liquors, powder, dynamite, wild game, and other commodities which are peculiarly subject to the local police laws, but they have never gone so far as this law, including commodities of common use.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BATES].

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this legislation for the additional reason that it will encourage the authorities of our municipalities, our counties, and our States to put the men to work who are now in our penal institutions. There has been a prejudice against such labor on account of the fact that the product of it comes into competition with paid labor. I believe every man who goes into a penal institution and idles away his time comes forth a worse man than he went in, and I believe every man who goes into a penal institution and goes to work comes out a better man. We are all sentenced to work. I believe that work is a corrective and that all men who are sent to jails and penal institutions ought to be kept at work. The passage of this bill will make uniform and systematize the disposal of the products of convict labor, so that men under sentence can be put to work and at the same time the interests of men who work for wages will not be hurt or jeopardized.

Mr. MANN. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON] seems to be in doubt about the constitutionality of this measure. I rise simply to call his attention to a case that he may not have examined, in re Rahrer, reported on page 545 of 140 United States, which seems to be on all fours with this matter here, and I believe there is no doubt about the constitutionality of this measure.

In the second place, I am in favor of this bill because I believe it is based upon a right principle. I believe that a question of this kind ought to be settled by the local authorities. This simply says that where a State has made regulations concerning the sale of convict-made goods those regulations shall apply. It seems to me that is a reasonable and proper principle.

In the third place, I am in favor of this bill because it affords a measure of protection for free labor against cheap convict labor.

I am in favor of the bill and hope it will pass.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. HENSLEY. I ask unanimous consent to amend the bill in line 3, page 1, following the word "manufactured," by inserting a comma and the words "produced or mined"; also, on page 2, in line 2, following the word "manufactured," to insert a comma and the words "produced or mined."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to modify his motion in a manner which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 3, after the word "manufactured," insert a comma and the words "produced or mined."

On page 2, in line 2, after the word "manufactured," insert a comma and the words "produced or mined."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The original proposition is modified in the respect named. The question is, Shall the rules be suspended and the bill passed?

The question was taken; and two-thirds voting in the affirmative, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 2453. An act for the relief of Benjamin F. Martz, and for other purposes.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 5, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Navy submitting estimate of an appropriation for Navy wireless telegraph stations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913 (H. Doc. No. 590); to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, pursuant to river and harbor act of June 25, 1910, copy of contract with Chesapeake & Albemarle Canal Co. for purchase of canal owned by said company (H. Doc. No. 589); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. DOREMUS, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 20347) to construct a dam across White River at or near Cotter, Ark., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 389), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. DU PONT submitted an amendment relative to reenlistments in the Army or in the Signal Corps after the President shall by proclamation have called upon honorably discharged soldiers of the Regular Army to present themselves within a specified period, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment relative to the detachments of certain officers in the Army, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAPP submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,500 for the extension of a ditch at the Pipestone Indian School, Minnesota, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and Tucker Acts, which was referred to the Committee on Claims (with accompanying paper) and ordered to be printed.

THE POSTAL SERVICE (S. DOC. NO. 379).

Mr. GARDNER. On the 26th of February I introduced a bill (S. 5474) to provide for the general welfare and to regulate commerce with foreign countries and between the several States and to increase and enlarge the facilities and efficiency of the Post Office Department. Since that time I have compiled some statistics on the subject. I ask unanimous consent to have 5,000 additional copies printed as a Senate document for the use of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order asked for by the Senator from Maine is entered.

The order as agreed to was reduced to writing, as follows:

Ordered, That 5,000 additional copies of the document "The Parcel Post and High Cost of Living, a Problem in Express Service; Relief to Consumers and Express Shippers Through Postal Express," be printed for the use of the Senate.

THE LAWRENCE (MASS.) STRIKE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there other morning business?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I move to take from the calendar for present consideration Senate resolution 231.

Mr. LODGE. Has the morning business been concluded?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not announced the conclusion of morning business. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution:

The SECRETARY. Order of Business 357, Senate resolution 231, a resolution by Mr. POINDEXTER for the investigation and report by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor regarding certain labor conditions in Lawrence, Mass.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from Washington a question. He has made a number of ineffectual attempts to get the resolution before the Senate, which, I regret, were not successful. The other day when it was under discussion the last clause seemed the cause of debate. I should like to ask the Senator from Washington whether that clause has been eliminated?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And practically the suggestion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] has prevailed.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; my suggestion has the effect of accepting the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The conduct of the local authorities is obviated in its present form. I can see no objection to the resolution, and hope it may be considered this morning.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Any objection made on that account is obviated.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am in favor of the resolution of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will state to the Senator that my understanding is that the amendment is still pending.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Texas is still pending.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It has been accepted, I understand.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I think we ought to have the regular order.

Mr. CULBERSON. If the Senator in charge of the resolution accepts the amendment—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois demands the regular order. That is an objection to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Cullom	Lodge	Root
Bourne	Curtis	Lorimer	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Dillingham	McLean	Smith, Md.
Briggs	Dixon	Martin, Va.	Smith, Mich.
Bristow	du Pont	Martine, N. J.	Smith, S. C.
Brown	Foster	Myers	Stephenson
Burnham	Gallinger	Nixon	Sutherland
Burton	Gardner	O'Gorman	Swanson
Chamberlain	Gronna	Overman	Thornton
Clapp	Guggenheim	Page	Tillman
Clark, Wyo.	Heyburn	Perkins	Townsend
Clarke, Ark.	Johnson, Me.	POINDEXTER	Warren
Crane	Johnston, Ala.	Pomerene	Watson
Crawford	Kenyon	Rayner	Wetmore
Culbertson	Lea	Richardson	Williams

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am sorry to state that my colleague [Mr. GAMBLE] is necessarily absent on business. I will state for the day that he has a general pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present. Is there other morning business?

DUTY ON LEAD AND ZINC ORE.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask to have a letter I have received from A. L. Warner, of Duluth, Minn., inserted in the RECORD. It relates to the tariff on lead and zinc ore, or concentrates, and seems to be a very fair discussion of that question. I desire to have it for use in the consideration of that subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota? The Chair hears none, and the order is entered.

The letter is as follows:

DULUTH, MINN., February 24, 1912.

HON. MOSES E. CLAPP,

Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I have been watching with a great deal of interest the developments of the bill which is now before the Senate applying to duty on lead and zinc ore, or concentrates. I have also taken considerable trouble to ascertain the facts in connection with the mining and smelting of zinc in the United States, Canada, and old Mexico.

I received a copy of the Wallace Miner, which is published in Wallace, Idaho, dated February 15, 1912. I inclose a clipping from this paper entitled "Opposes tariff reduction."

Wallace is located in a little valley in the Coeur d'Alene district. I am quite familiar with the mining conditions in this district, and also with conditions in lead camps in Canada adjoining the Coeur d'Alene. The same wages are paid to miners in both districts, and the cost of operating and mining is practically the same, as the mines are on the same range separated only by the international border. Therefore there is no legitimate reason why the duty should be imposed on lead and zinc ore, or concentrates coming from the Coeur d'Alene district in Canada into the United States.

The basis of tariff in my opinion is based upon labor. Labor and natural conditions being the same in two countries, there is no reason why the tariff should be imposed against products of either country, where the cost of production is the same.

I am connected with a property in the Coeur d'Alene district, which has been operated for about two years. We are paying at the present time for crosscutting and drifting in our mine $9 per foot for a cross-cut 6½ by 7. The average price of work of this kind in the district is $10 per foot. These figures are based on actual contracts for development work, therefore they are correct.

I note by the Inspector's report, which I am inclosing to you, that they refer to labor of Mexico and Spain, which is paid an average wage of about 50 cents per day. This statement is absolutely false. I am connected with, and, in fact, managing a company operating in Mexico, near Cananea, Sonora. We are mining lead, zinc, and copper. The average cost for mining and milling the past year was $3.75 per ton. We are paying Mexican labor $1.60 per day gold. It is inefficient labor, and it will take at least two Mexican miners to do as much work in 10 hours as it will one American miner to do the same amount of work in the same time—wholly on account of the Mexican miner being inefficient and inexperienced and not able to do the amount of work that the American miner can do.

The contract price for crosscutting and drifting in the Cananea district is $10 per foot gold. We have recently let a contract for crosscutting 150 feet for which we paid $10 per foot for the work. This work was let by contract to competitive bidders. Therefore the labor cost per ton for mining ore in Mexico is equal to the cost per ton for the same work in the Coeur d'Alene district in Idaho or Canada. The expense of operating in Mexico is about 15 per cent higher than in the United States. Lumber is higher, groceries are higher, steel is higher, and clothing is higher. Therefore, the operating of a mining industry in Mexico is more expensive and costs more per ton to mine and produce ore than it does in the Coeur d'Alene district in Idaho or the Joplin district of Missouri.

In a conversation last week with Mr. Fred Hugo, of Duluth, who is managing a zinc property in the Joplin district, Missouri, he told me that their cost of mining and milling was less than $3 per ton in that district. Mr. Hugo is also interested with me in the property near Cananea, Sonora. He said our cost was too high, and if our mine was located in the United States, where it could be more cheaply operated, it would be worth double what it is to-day.

When you get the honest opinion of operators in the zinc districts of the United States, they will tell you, if they are familiar with the facts, that the cost of production is less in the United States per ton than in Mexico. It is true that some of the leading furnace men of the United States are bitterly opposed to the tariff reduction on lead and zinc ore or concentrates. This applies only to lead and zinc furnace companies that have a supply for their furnaces. The furnace companies who depend on buying their ore in the open market are in favor of free lead and zinc coming into the United States from Mexico, for the reason that there is a broader market which can not be as easily controlled and will be a great benefit in supplying their smelters.

I met the Congressman representing Oklahoma on the train. He was going to Bartlesville to look the situation over. He told me that the smelters in the Bartlesville district were very anxious for free zinc from Mexico, for they depended on the small mines to keep their smelters running, for they buy their zinc ore or concentrates in the open market.

The large lead and zinc smelting companies, such as the Guggenheims, the New Jersey Lead & Zinc Co., the American Lead & Zinc Co., and other smelting companies in the States who own and control lead and zinc properties are bitterly opposed to admitting lead and zinc from any country into the States free. By keeping out lead and zinc ores or concentrates, owning and operating mines to supply their smelters, they can practically control the lead and zinc business in the States, therefore they would be opposed to admitting lead and zinc ores or concentrates free, for by doing so it would broaden the market so it would not be as easy to control, and the broad market would assist the smaller smelters to build up larger smelting industries in the States, which would stimulate competition.

I am also advised the Guggenheims are making quite extensive plans for increasing their smelter capacity in Mexico. In my opinion this question solves itself down to a few concerns controlling the lead and zinc business of the world. If these enterprises or smelting concerns are able to keep lead and zinc ore or concentrates from coming into the United States free of duty and control the lead and zinc industry of the United States and build smelters in Mexico to control the lead and zinc business in Mexico, they are building up a monopoly that will be far harder to cope with than the Steel Trust or the Standard Oil Co. It also builds up industries in a foreign country which would come to the United States if the duty was taken off of lead and zinc ore or concentrates, so that the product could be shipped to the States and manufactured here. Instead of its being a detriment to the laboring class in the United States it would be a benefit to them, as it will not reduce the wages, but will increase the smelting business in the States, which will make more work for the laboring man and will build up industries in our own country and not in a foreign country.

Notwithstanding the fact that it costs more to mine and concentrate ore in Mexico than it does in the United States, we have a freight charge of $5.50 per ton from our mines to the nearest smelter. In the Joplin district the smelters are practically at the door of the mines. The freight rate from the mines in Idaho to smelters is less than in Mexico. I am told the rate is $4.50 per ton. The exact amount can be easily ascertained.

I trust that you will consider this matter carefully and thoroughly investigate the facts in connection with the bill now pending in the United States Senate, which places zinc ore from Mexico on the free list. I feel positive that the placing of zinc and lead ores from Mexico on the free list is in the interests of the majority of our people and that it will build up and foster the zinc-smelting industry in our country.

Yours, very truly,

A. L. WARNER.

SUGAR-TARIFF REDUCTION (S. DOC. NO. 378).

Mr. CURTIS. I have a copy of a brief digest of the testimony embodied in the hearings held before the Hardwick special committee on the investigation of the American Sugar Refining Co and others, compiled by Truman G. Palmer, on the subject of sugar-tariff reduction. I move that the digest be printed as a Senate document.

The motion was agreed to.

DUTY ON RAW SUGAR (S. DOC. NO. 377).

Mr. CURTIS. I have a paper containing 24 arguments advanced by the New York refiners of raw sugar favoring the reduction or removal of the duty on foreign raw sugar, the wrecking of the people's home beet-sugar industry, and re-establishing in the refiners an absolute monopoly of the sugar business and consequent control of prices to the consumer, together with a reply to each argument, which has been prepared by Truman G. Palmer. I move that the matter be printed as a Senate document.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On February 29, 1912:

S. 4475. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to simplify the issue of enrollments and licenses of vessels of the United States."

On March 1, 1912:

S. 238. An act to authorize the extension of Lamont Street NW., in the District of Columbia.

On March 4, 1912:

S. 3776. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Board of County Commissioners of Lincoln County, State of Montana, to construct, maintain, and operate three bridges across the Kootenai River, in the State of Montana; and

S. 4749. An act relative to members of the female nurse corps serving in Alaska or at places without the limits of the United States.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

H. R. 16612. An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to convey a certain lot in the city of Alva, Okla.; and

H. R. 17032. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to grant further extension of time within which to make proof on desert-land entries in the counties of Modoc and Lassen, Cal.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

H. R. 16661. An act to relinquish, release, remise, and quit-claim all right, title, and interest of the United States of America in and to all the lands held under claim or color of title by individuals or private ownership or municipal ownership situated in the State of Alabama which were reserved, retained, or set apart to or for the Creek Tribe or Nation of Indians under and by virtue of the treaty entered into between the United States of America and the Creek Tribe or Nation of Indians on March 24, 1832; and

H. R. 19863. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to subdivide and extend the deferred payments of settlers in the Kiowa-Comanche and Apache ceded lands in Oklahoma.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

H. R. 17239. An act to authorize Arkansas & Memphis Railway Bridge & Terminal Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River;

H. R. 19638. An act to authorize San Antonio, Rockport & Mexican Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Morris and Cummings Channel; and

H. R. 20117. An act to authorize the Nebraska-Iowa Interstate Bridge Co. to construct a bridge across the Missouri River near Bellevue, Nebr.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

H. R. 5601. An act to limit the effect of the regulation of interstate commerce between the States in goods, wares, and merchandise wholly or in part manufactured by convict labor or in any prison or reformatory; and

H. R. 14083. An act to create a new division of the southern judicial district of Texas, and to provide for terms of court at Corpus Christi, Tex., and for a clerk for said court, and for other purposes.

H. R. 16306. An act to provide for the use of the American National Red Cross in aid of the land and naval forces in time of actual or threatened war was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

H. R. 20048. An act declaring that all citizens of Porto Rico and certain natives permanently residing in said island shall be citizens of the United States was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

GENERAL ARBITRATION TREATIES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there further morning business? Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I move, notwithstanding the objection—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

Mr. POINDEXTER. Notwithstanding the objection, I move to proceed to the present consideration of Senate resolution 231, and I move the adoption of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution named by him.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I move to proceed to the consideration of the resolution as amended.

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of order that, under the unanimous-consent agreement, nothing is in order to-day except that special order of the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. It is absolutely specific.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unanimous-consent agreement, the Chair notices, does not say at what time the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the treaty matter, and the Senate can do so at any time it sees fit, but it must do it at some time during the day.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think the resolution for which I ask consideration will only take a few moments.

Mr. LODGE. I think it has been the universal practice—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that is a matter which the Chair can not pass upon, but which the Senate must pass upon.

Mr. CULBERSON. Before the Chair makes a formal announcement I invite the attention of the Chair to the ruling of the Chair on yesterday to the effect that this special order would take effect immediately after the routine morning business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks he made no such ruling.

Mr. CULBERSON. In answer to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]—

Mr. CULLOM. That certainly has been the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair notices by the Record that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] made the inquiry:

That is, it will be taken up after the routine morning business?

And the Chair answered:

After the routine morning business.

The Chair must say in that connection that at the time he made the response to the Senator from Michigan the Chair had in mind the usual form of unanimous-consent agreement and supposed that the matter would come up immediately after the morning business was concluded, but the resolution does not so state. It is therefore a matter for the Senate to determine.

Mr. LODGE. Then, Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the general arbitration treaties as in open executive session.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington has made a motion to proceed to the consideration of another matter.

Mr. LODGE. A motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business is a privileged motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct in that statement.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, is not the motion which I made also a privileged motion under Rule IX?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is; but the motion which the Senator from Massachusetts makes takes precedence.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CULBERSON. Under the head of "General arbitration treaties," in the Record of yesterday's proceedings, occurs the following:

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, apropos of the motion just agreed to, I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry. I notice that unanimous consent was given some days ago to vote on the British and French arbitration treaties on Tuesday, the 5th instant. I should like to inquire whether, under this unanimous-consent agreement, that will be the first business taken up in the morning?

The VICE PRESIDENT. After the morning business.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is, it will be taken up after the routine morning business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. After the routine morning business.

I suggest that the Chair has ruled on this proposition, and ruled correctly, and the Senate so understands it from the colloquy between the Chair and the Senator from Michigan on yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state, in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], that, of course, he has read the Record correctly, but the Chair at the time he made the response to the inquiry of the Senator from Michigan did not have the unanimous-consent agreement before him and was speaking from memory. Now the matter, it seems to the Chair, is disposed of by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] making his motion, which puts the whole proposition up to the Senate, Will the Senate now proceed to the consideration of this matter in open executive session? It is a motion which is now in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I make a parliamentary inquiry as to the meaning of "morning business." Does not "morning business" include up until the hour of 4 o'clock, or 2 o'clock at least, the calling of the calendar, and an opportunity to move to take up matters on the calendar?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; "morning business" is certain routine business, as laid down in the rule, that may proceed for two hours, but can be closed before, and is closed before, when the Chair so announces. After the conclusion of that business and the announcement by the Chair to that effect, then the Chair thinks the motion which the Senator made was in order, but after he had made that motion the Senator from Massachusetts made a motion, action upon which is preferential under Rule XXII, and that is the matter which must first be disposed of.

Mr. GALLINGER. Regular order!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaties of arbitration between Great Britain and France and the United States.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to take a few moments to correct a statement that I made when addressing the Senate on Thursday last in regard to the pending treaties.

In stating that no postal treaty had ever been submitted to the Senate I overlooked, despite a very careful search, one postal treaty which was made in December, 1848, with Great Britain. At that time, prior to the statute of 1851, the rates on foreign postage were fixed by statute, and there was no method of making special rates with any country while the statute remained unrepealed except by treaty. The treaty with Great Britain was accordingly made, Lord Palmerston and Mr. Bancroft being the negotiators, and was duly ratified by the Senate. There was one other treaty which is sometimes referred to as a postal convention, and in this connection I think it well to mention it. This treaty was made with New Granada in 1844 and was necessary because it involved the carrying of United States mails across the Isthmus; that is, through foreign territory. No treaty involving the transit of United States mails across foreign territory could be made now or at any time except in the regular treaty form and with submission to the Senate. This case, therefore, has no bearing on the question of postal treaties as a precedent. The treaty with Great Britain is an exception, but, I believe, the only one; and it proves, I think, the existence of the rule in regard to our action as a government in respect to postal treaties which I attempted to lay down. I do not think that it affects in any way the conclusions to be drawn from our otherwise uniform practice or the proposition that foreign, like domestic, postal arrangements are dealt with and have always been dealt with under the power to establish post offices and post roads and to regulate foreign commerce.

I ask that this statement may be printed as a note to the copy of the speech which was ordered printed by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that will be done.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, the doctrine that peace can only be maintained by the ability of a nation to defend itself is not sound. Armament adequate for the Nation's defense is necessary because self-preservation is the first law of nature, and its enforcement is the first and paramount duty of every great nation. An efficient navy with power to repel assault is imperative, but the need of it is for self-protection and self-preservation purposes. It has no office as a peace agent and no force as a peace argument. Its power might be useful to force ungenerous and unfair terms of surrender upon a conquered nation, but never has this Government ever suggested a cessation of hostilities upon terms but the most generous and conscionable. Never in all the history of civilized nations did a heavy armament ever avert war nor did a small armament ever invoke war.

It is very easy to say that the shores of the Mediterranean would be to-day peaceful had Turkey possessed a strong navy. But the statement is naked and unsupported by any fact, and is a reflection on the Italian Government. Any opinion either way on that subject is idle and inconclusive and proves nothing, for opinions come and go easily as the exigency of debate or the distress of the debater may suggest. Did the great navies of Japan or Russia, a few years ago, avoid war, or did the smaller navy of either invite war? Did the size of our sea armament have anything at all to do either to encourage or discourage a declaration of war against Spain, or was the inefficiency of Spain's navy given any consideration at all when Congress voted $50,000,000 to President McKinley to prosecute war against that country? Every man knows we would have declared war at that time even if Spain's navy had been the greatest in the world and we had had no ships at all. Therefore, it seems to me, in considering these treaties intended to promote peace by arbitration the argument which would substitute Dreadnoughts for an arbitration court is not sound.

The issue presented by the pending treaties as negotiated by the President and submitted to the Senate for ratification can not be obscured by opinion builders, however talented or scholarly they may be. The American people know what the issue is and the Senate may as well meet it frankly and in the open. It will add perhaps to the literature of the country, but not to the good name of the Senate, for us to quibble and haggle over the importance of large navies or over the meaning of words which have a well-defined significance in the average mind of the American citizen.

There is one delightful thing about peace—everybody advocates it. As an abstract proposition it has no enemies. For 2,000 years the world has talked for peace and has been at war more or less during all of that time. The time has come now when less talk about it and more effort to maintain it should be made by nations. The pending treaties mark the first constructive effort by this country and Great Britain and France to make peace certain between them at least. These treaties propose to broaden the field of arbitration by including subjects of dispute heretofore excluded from that field. Herein lies the one chief characteristic distinguishing these from existing general arbitration treaties.

We have to-day 19 agreements with as many countries providing for the arbitration of differences which may arise between us, provided such differences do not arise over questions involving vital interests or the national honor. Let me read you article 1 of the existing arbitration treaty negotiated with Great Britain by this country and ratified June 4, 1903. The same article is found, I think, in all the other 18 arbitration treaties with other countries. The article reads:

Differences which may arise of a legal nature or relating to the interpretation of treaties existing between the two contracting parties, and which it may not have been possible to settle by diplomacy, shall be referred to the permanent court of arbitration established at The Hague by the convention of the 29th of July, 1899: Provided, nevertheless, That they do not affect the vital interests, the independence, or the honor of the two contracting States and do not concern the interests of third parties.

That is the provision in existing treaties corresponding with article 1 in the pending treaties. The proviso contained in the article I have read in the existing treaties is omitted from the treaties which were negotiated by the President and have been referred to the Senate for ratification.

The importance of the omission and its significance for practical peace purposes must be conceded. The pending treaties are real peace contracts as compared with the existing treaties, and the proof of it lies in the fact that the questions excluded from arbitration by the existing treaties are submissible to arbitration under the proposed treaties.

Let us examine this point in some detail. Can anyone recall a war between civilized peoples the cause of which arose over some question not involving the vital interest or the national honor of either nation? I do not think such an instance can be cited in all history. It must be conceded, then, that whenever wars have been waged the cause of them arose over questions involving either the vital interest or the national honor, or both, of the peoples in conflict.

The existing treaties exclude, therefore, from the field of arbitration the very causes and the only causes of any war that was ever fought. The fact that the pending treaties propose to submit to arbitration the questions that have caused war make them, if lived up to by the contracting nations, guarantees for peace. This accounts, in my judgment, for the widespread and well-grounded public sentiment of the people of the United States in favor of their ratification. The public mind is quick to see the real issue in every public question. The public conscience abhors war as it does crime, and when the public mind sees, as it does in these treaties, an agreement to arbitrate the only disputes that ever cause war, any attempt to delay or defeat ratification becomes the subject of public impatience and public disapproval. It will not do for us to waive this public sentiment aside by stigmatizing it as popular clamor. It is not clamor. It is the public intelligence and public conscience at work in every home, and in every church, and in every school-house, and in every walk of life of a free and courageous people.

It was suggested here the other day by a very distinguished Senator that he had become weary and impatient because of what he termed the clamor in favor of these treaties and at the criticism which had been directed against the Senate because it had not yet ratified them. I do not agree with the Senator on that point. My notion is the Senate has less excuse to be impatient with the people than the people have to be impatient with the Senate. These treaties were submitted to the Senate for action August 4, 1911, more than seven months ago. Congress was in session at the time, and remained in session, I think, for three weeks after the message of the President submitting them. We adjourned and reconvened the 4th of December, and have been in session, with the exception of a 10-day vacation, ever since. Not until very recently has any serious consideration been given to them by the Senate. On these facts the Senate may not be censurable as a matter of right and justice—on that I express no opinion—but on these facts certainly the public is not censurable because it fails to understand why no action has been had during all these months. If these treaties are without merit they should have been rejected long ago. If they are right they should have been ratified long ago. The Committee on Foreign Relations was quick to bring in its report, which was a very pronounced indictment against the treaties as negotiated. The delay can not be laid at the door of the committee.

But I have digressed. Let us return to the treaties themselves and leave the dilatory and procrastinating habit of the Senate to the tender mercies of a patient and, I hope, a forgiving people. The fact that the pending treaties propose to submit to an international court of arbitration questions involving vital interest and national honor should command the support, it seems to me, of every man who desires to see arbitration actually substituted for war.

This principle had the support of the Senate of the United States in 1890, and is shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD under date of February 14 of that year. On that day the Senate adopted by unanimous vote Senator Sherman's resolution calling upon the President to negotiate all inclusive arbitration treaties with foreign governments. The resolution reads as follows:

That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to invite from time to time, as fit occasions may arise, negotiations with any government with which the United States has or may have diplomatic relations, to the end that any differences or disputes arising between the two Governments which can not be adjusted by diplomatic agency may be referred to arbitration and be peaceably adjusted by such means.

You will observe that the resolution excluded no subject whatever from the field of arbitration, but says in express words that "any differences or disputes" arising between the two Governments and which can not be adjusted by diplomacy shall be referred to arbitration. At that time the Senate of the United States did not hesitate to express its approval of the cardinal doctrine of the pending treaties. Nor was the Senate the only legislative branch of the Government that expressed an opinion in 1890 on this question. Sherman's resolution went to the House and was concurred in by that body three months later. Nor is that all. The resolution was considered by the British Parliament, which in a resolution of its own expressed the hope that Her Majesty, the Queen of England, would co-operate with the United States along the lines laid down in the Sherman resolution.

Nothing substantial was heard of this doctrine from that time until negotiations were opened by the President of the United States with the representatives of the British and French Governments, culminating in the treaties under consideration. The result is that nothing to-day stands in the way of making the doctrine of real arbitration a fact except the Senate of the United States. We have the power to kill it. I take every Senator here at his word, and I have no doubt that every Senator is just as anxious to really promote peace as he is willing to advocate peace. Our trouble is the same trouble that always confronts anybody who undertakes to practically provide ways and means for doing something that he knows ought to be done. It took men generations and centuries to devise and establish a plan by which differences arising between individuals might be adjudicated and settled without violence. The plan is not yet perfect so far as its success as an agency to do exact and full justice in all instances is concerned, but it approximates success. It provides a way in which every dispute between men, whether the dispute involves the vital interest or the property or the honor of the individual, must be submitted under the law to a court of arbitration. We have provided compulsory arbitration for every citizen in affairs of his own. The decision of the arbitration court may not always be right, but we compel the citizen to submit his controversy to the court and to abide by the decision, right or wrong. If it is possible to arbitrate all differences arising between individuals, it must be possible for us to provide a plan under which all differences between nations can be arbitrated.

It can be done. Here are three great nations, composed of civilized and Christian peoples. Each has been able to provide due process of law for its citizens. Law and order settle all domestic disputes. Force is no longer the arbiter in any of the three countries. If men have been able to provide due process of law for themselves as individuals and citizens, what excuse have they for failing to provide due process of law for the nations of which they are citizens? One is certainly just as practicable and ought to be just as possible as the other, and it is if we set our heads and hearts to the task of working out the plan.

The President has proposed this plan. If anyone has a better one, let it be suggested. The public has no unflinching devotion to any particular plan, but the plan offered here is the only plan as yet suggested. I believe we ought to try it.

Let us look at the plan proposed. Article 1 of the treaties before us, which is substituted for article 1 of existing treaties, is as follows:

All differences hereafter arising between the high contracting parties, which it has not been possible to adjust by diplomacy, relating to international matters in which the high contracting parties are concerned by virtue of a claim of right made by one against the other, under treaty or otherwise, and which are justiciable in their nature by reason of being susceptible of decision by the application of the principles of law or equity, shall be submitted to the permanent court of arbitration established at The Hague by the convention of October 18, 1907, or to some other arbitral tribunal, as shall [may] be decided in each case by special agreement, which special agreement shall provide for the organization of such tribunal if necessary, to define the scope of the powers of the arbitrators, the question or questions at issue, and settle the terms of reference and the procedure thereunder.

The first objection urged to this article, so far as I am advised, is that it omits the proviso in article 1 of existing treaties excluding questions of vital interest and national honor from arbitration. I have already discussed that objection; but objection is also made that the language of this article is ambiguous and of uncertain meaning. The phrase "claim of right" is taken up by itself and numerous definitions of lexicographers are given to show what "claim" means and then what "right" means, and then an argument designed to add to the confusion is made to show that these words, used together, have no definite significance at all.

The critic takes the word "justiciable" and the words "law or equity" separately and apart and then all together, and finds serious trouble and insurmountable difficulty in an effort to discover what is meant. I have very little patience personally with these hypercritical and technical discussions. Of course, everyone will acknowledge that words and phrases may have different shades of meaning. The law of definition is not an exact science. I am willing to take the ordinary and usual interpretation given to these words and phrases and leave them in the treaties, although no doubt other language might be used which would suit some minds better, if they could be suited at all; but what might suit the mental attitude of one Senator would very likely arouse the critical attitude of his colleague.

The phrase "claim of right" with ordinary people and to an ordinary mind carries the notion of an obligation of one party to another; ordinarily the term means a legal right. Being an obligation or legal right, it necessarily excludes the idea of national policy, either domestic or foreign. A claim of right implies that something is due; it may arise out of a contract, either express or implied, or it may arise out of a wrongful act. The phrase "of a legal nature," used in article 1 of the existing treaties, is a phrase susceptible of as many shades of meaning and of as many different possible applications as the phrase "claim of right" in the pending treaties.

So with the other words: "Justiciable" is generally accepted to mean by the average man, when applied to a controversy, that it is susceptible of determination by applying the rules of justice, which is another way of saying the principles of law or equity. The principles of law and equity are the principles of justice. We speak of a court of law and of a court of equity; they are both courts of justice. The words "law" and "equity" relate in their differences to procedure and remedy as well as to principles. The distinction between the two is fast disappearing. Courts and lawyers have ever disagreed just where the dividing line is between legal and equitable principles. It has been said that equity appeals to the conscience of the chancellor while the law appeals to the intelligence of the court. The ordinary and usual everyday interpretation of the language of article 1 is that all differences involving every question of a substantial character in which one nation in good faith makes a demand upon another, and which can be determined according to the principles of justice, shall be submitted to arbitration. But, whether or not the language is so ambiguous as to merit criticism, I call your attention to the fact that after discussing in a most critical way the language of the article referred to the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] concluded his criticism with these words:

If these treaties, following the example of those now upon the statute books, had stopped with article 1, which enlarges and defines with a new definition the scope of arbitration, there would have been, I think, no question as to their immediate ratification.

So I take it that if as learned a critic as the Senator from Massachusetts is after all willing to accept the language of article 1, no friend of the treaties has need to entertain any fear on account of it.

Article 2 reads as follows:

The high contracting parties further agree to institute as occasion arises, and as hereinafter provided, a joint high commission of inquiry to which, upon the request of either party, shall be referred for impartial and conscientious investigation any controversy between the parties within the scope of article 1, before such controversy has been submitted to arbitration, and also any other controversy hereafter arising between them, even if they are not agreed that it falls within the scope of article 1: Provided, however, That such reference may be postponed until the expiration of one year after the date of the formal request therefor in order to afford an opportunity for diplomatic discussion and adjustment of the questions in controversy, if either party desires such postponement.

Whenever a question or matter of difference is referred to the joint high commission of inquiry, as herein provided, each of the high contracting parties shall designate three of its nationals to act as members of the commission of inquiry for the purposes of such reference; or the commission may be otherwise constituted in any particular case by the terms of reference, the membership of the commission and the terms of reference to be determined in each case by an exchange of notes.

This article has not been discussed in any way by those who oppose the treaties. To my mind it is a most important and far-reaching provision. It provides for a joint commission whose duty shall be to investigate every controversy arising between the countries within the scope of article 1, and provides that the investigation shall be made before such controversy shall be submitted to arbitration. It further provides that the investigation, at the request of either party, shall be postponed for at least a year in order to afford an opportunity for an adjustment through diplomatic agencies. The judgment and finding on both law and fact shall be made by the commission, and while such finding is not binding on either party under the express terms of article 3, still the effect will be to hold the contracting countries away from war during the period of 12 months, a sufficient time to adjust peaceably, in all human probability, every controversy that may arise. This article, therefore, to my mind, is of and by itself an almost certain guaranty of future peace, actual peace, between this and any other country who will make and keep such a contract.

Of course, I assume and I refuse to entertain for a moment any other assumption than that these contracts, if made, will be kept by the countries making them. I look upon every suggestion made by those who for one reason or another seek to discredit the treaties that they will be broken by us as a most desperate if not an ignoble suggestion. When did this Government ever violate any of its treaty obligations? Who on this floor is willing seriously to suggest that the people of this Government will ever tolerate the bad faith involved in violating any treaty obligation? Those men who suggest it now do a very grave and unwarranted injustice to the American people. Americans are as jealous of their Nation's honor as they are of their own, and they will never submit to the violation of any treaty which the Nation may make. The fact that the American people are willing to arbitrate their differences with another country proves their determination as well as their willingness to accept the judgment of the arbitrators.

The average citizen knows that when his country's quarrel is submitted to a court of arbitration, with jurisdiction and power to inquire into the controversy, that submission carries with it the power to adjudicate the controversy either for or against us. If he is not willing to abide by the result, he would not be willing to enter into the contract to submit the controversy. What sort of political morality is it which suggests any sort of arbitration which would give us the right to accept the judgment of the arbitrators or to reject it at our pleasure? The other country by the arbitration method takes a chance to lose; so do we. Just as in the case of war, both countries take the chance of defeat. The losing party is bound by the war verdict; the losing party is bound by the arbitration verdict. In every dispute between citizens which goes to the courts for arbitration one party must lose, and the winning and the losing parties are both bound by the judgment. So it is with disputes between nations.

Article 2, which I have read, is new to the treaty literature of the world; such a provision can not be found in any existing treaties between the nations of either hemisphere. It is a distinct, substantial, and practical step forward toward the peace of the world.

Article 3 reads, as follows:

The joint high commission of inquiry, instituted in each case as provided for in article 2, is authorized to examine into and report upon the particular questions or matters referred to it for the purpose of facilitating the solution of disputes by elucidating the facts, and to define the issues presented by such questions, and also to include in its report such recommendations and conclusions as may be appropriate.

The reports of the commission shall not be regarded as decisions of the questions or matters so submitted, either on the facts or on the law, and shall in no way have the character of an arbitral award.

It is further agreed, however, that in cases in which the parties disagree as to whether or not a difference is subject to arbitration under article 1 of this treaty, that question shall be submitted to the joint high commission of inquiry; and if all or all but one of the members of the commission agree and report that such differences are within the scope of article 1, it shall be referred to arbitration in accordance with the provisions of this treaty.

No objection is made to this article, as I understand it, except to the last paragraph, wherein it is agreed that there shall be submitted to the joint high commission of inquiry the justiciability of the controversy. The objection to this paragraph rests on the interpretation given to it that the judgment of the commission on the justiciability of the controversy is final and binding, and therefore the constitutional prerogatives of the Senate as a part of the treaty-making power are impaired. In my judgment the interpretation is incorrect. Such an interpretation can not be sustained unless you construe the paragraph by itself, without relation to the other provisions of the treaty and without regard to the last sentence in the paragraph. An interpretation which to sustain makes it necessary to disregard all the rest of the document and a portion of the paragraph interpreted is not an interpretation which will commend itself very enthusiastically to the average American citizen. While this paragraph submits to the joint high commission the justiciability of a controversy between the contracting nations, it expressly says that the judgment on that question as rendered by the high commission, if five of them shall agree to it, shall be reported, and "it shall be referred to arbitration in accordance with the provisions of this treaty." Under article 1, the President, if he thinks the question justiciable, and the other country agrees with him, reports his finding to the Senate. His finding does not bind the Senate, because the article expressly leaves to the Senate the right to pass on the question of submission to the final court of arbitration. So likewise when the question of justiciability is left to the commission, because the President or the other contracting country thinks it is not justiciable and the commission reports its finding to the Senate, the Senate is not bound any more than it is when bound by the finding of the President on the question.

When there is agreement that the controversy is justiciable the President reports to the Senate; when there is a disagreement about the justiciability of the controversy the finding is reported by the commission. The Senate occupies the same office and the same relation to one finding that it does to the other. It follows that no prerogative, however dear or ancient, the Senate may possess is impaired or infringed in the least.

DELEGATION OF POWER.

The other day we heard a very able and exhaustive argument in support of the proposition that the treaty-making power could not be delegated. The speaker went so deeply into that much mooted question as to quote the Supreme Court and other eminent authority. I am glad the argument was made. It will probably never be answered. Nobody since the birth of the Republic ever suggested the contrary doctrine, and I apprehend nobody will ever do so; but of that I am not certain, for in the light of some of the arguments recently made on this question no man can tell what the logic of future days may be.

The commission is delegated to exercise no treaty function whatever. Its duties are limited and defined. Its jurisdiction is fixed. It can do nothing but inquire, investigate, and report upon the limited questions or matters referred to it, if acting under clauses 1 and 2 of article 3, defining the issues presented by such questions and including recommendations; but if acting under clause 3 of article 3, it shall do nothing but investigate and report its findings on whether the question is arbitrable under article 1 of the treaty. To do these specific and definite things, limited by the terms of article 1, is obviously not an exercise of the treaty-making power in whole or in part. To hold otherwise is to fly in the face of the repeated pronouncements of the Supreme Court during a century and more.

The customhouse officers of the Government do not exercise delegated legislative power, yet they determine by direction of Congress what duties certain imports must bear according to rules and standards fixed by Congress. The Supreme Court has said the act of such Government officers is not a legislative act. The Supreme Court has also held that the Interstate Commerce Commission does not exercise delegated legislative power when it fixes a freight rate, because Congress declared the standard the commission should use in determining the rate. In clause 3 of article 3 the President and the Senate, the sole and exclusive treaty-making power of the Government, fix the standard by which the high commission must govern itself in reaching a conclusion on the subject referred to it. This standard is jurisdictional. To go beyond it or to stop short of it is to nullify the judgment for want of jurisdiction.

In this connection the learned Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], in an expression of his views to the Senate, cites a diplomatic precedent which alone is sufficient to conclude the debate on the question. About 75 years ago Great Britain and this country were in discord over the boundary line dividing the British possessions from the Northeastern States. The line was described in the treaty of 1782. Great Britain claimed the line described in the treaty had one location, and the United States claimed it had another location. By arbitration agreement the King of the Netherlands became the arbitrator to investigate and locate the boundary line. Under the agreement submitting the question to the King of the Netherlands it was provided that he need not be bound to choose between the two lines claimed by the two countries, but was directed to investigate and determine where the boundary line as described in the treaty really was. For some reason he found it impractical or impossible to determine the location of the line described in the treaty of 1782, but he did investigate and determine and reported as arbitrator a boundary line between the two countries which seemed to him to be the most convenient and practicable.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. BROWN. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator knows, of course, the ground on which we rejected that decision.

Mr. BROWN. I discussed the ground.

Mr. LODGE. We rejected it on the ground that it was not a decision.

Mr. BROWN. Our protest to the award was filed on the ground of want of jurisdiction.

Mr. LODGE. I think if the Senator examines the protest he will see that we took the ground that he decided two questions, but on the others he merely expressed an opinion, and that on what he said we were entitled to a final decision.

Mr. BROWN. The fact was he reported his opinion, which amounted to a determination, so far as he was concerned, that the boundary was along a certain line.

The United States objected to the award for want of jurisdiction, insisting that the arbitrator had exceeded the limitations fixed by the agreement under which he was appointed. Great Britain accepted the protest of the United States as well grounded and treated the decision of the King of the Netherlands as a nullity.

It would appear clear from these authorities that none of the Senate's prerogatives are invaded by clause 3 of article 3.

However, upon the mistaken interpretation that the joint high commission might decide a question arbitrable which the Senate might deem not arbitrable and yet be bound by it, we are told that great peril is in store for this country. We have been told that some foreign country, not named, might be able to get the joint commission to submit the Monroe doctrine or our immigration policy or any other governmental policy to the arbitration court. It takes a strong and vivid imagination to picture these awful disasters which are so sure and so certain to follow the ratification of these treaties. Let us become alarmed slowly for two reasons: First, the interpretation is wrong and there is, therefore, no basis for the disasters anticipated; but even if the interpretation so warmly defended be accepted by the commission, still the Monroe doctrine would be in no danger, our independence and our domestic policies would remain safe, because such a judgment by the commission would be utterly void for want of jurisdiction, and the Senate, as well as the people of the United States, would so declare.

Whenever a court in this country acts without jurisdiction the judgment is void. So the judgment of this commission that the Monroe doctrine was arbitrable would be ultra vires and void. When such a judgment was treated by the American people and the Senate of the United States as void, it would not be a violation of this treaty in any degree or in any sense. The Government of the United States is wholly incompetent under the Constitution to arbitrate away its existence, its life, its independence, or its policies, just as a man is incompetent under the law to arbitrate away his freedom or his existence.

These treaties are made by sovereign nations. Each contracting power is a sovereign power, and the treaty is made by it as such. To contend that the independence or the existence or the integrity or the governmental policies of either is made by them the subject of arbitration is to contend that they are undertaking to consent to self-destruction, which is contrary to public policy the world over.

It has been argued in some quarters with apparent earnestness that we should be slow to broaden the field of arbitration, because "All the differences with other nations in which we shall be involved will be American questions." The point in this objection is obscure; just what is meant by it is not certain. If the objector means to say the location or site of the subject matter in dispute will be on the Western Hemisphere, the answer is that geography can not affect for good or ill the rights of either party. Every difference arising between this and another country, to be arbitrated under these treaties, must necessarily be at once an American and an European question. If it is an American question exclusively, no other country will have any interest in it; if it is an European question exclusively, this country will have no interest in it. In neither case will the other country ask for arbitration upon it.

This treaty proposes to arbitrate questions involving interests in which America and Great Britain or America and France claim an interest. Their location, whether in this or the other hemisphere geographically, will neither add to nor subtract from their importance nor their arbitrability. It is just as desirable to avoid war over questions arising on this side of the Atlantic as it is to avoid war by arbitrating differences arising on the other side. It is said when the disputes affect interests on our continent "we do not and can not enter upon these agreements on an equality of risk with other nations with which we treat." If the ratio of hazard is to guide and mold the arbitration policy of the United States, we may as well despair and abandon the policy all together. I had supposed that the movement for peace by substituting arbitration for war had a better foundation than the doctrine of chances. I still think so. If our friends who hesitate about arbitration on account of the risk involved will reflect a moment they will realize that war, too, involves not risk alone but danger and death and loss inevitable and irreparable.

Mr. President, it seems to me these treaties ought to be ratified. They promise peace and do not entangle us in any foreign alliance. They are separate agreements with Great Britain and France, each standing by itself. The treaty with France does not suggest any concern over the affairs of any other nation. The treaty with Great Britain creates no obligation on our part to participate in any differences she may have with any nation except our own. They are separate contracts and affect alone the two countries entering into the agreement. With these treaties ratified there is real reason to believe that similar treaties identical in form will be negotiated between this country and all of the other great nations of the earth.

While the Senate has the power, it has no right, in my judgment, to close the door which these treaties open to the settlement of international disputes the world over, which are as certain to arise in the future as they have in the past.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not my intention, Mr. President, to enter at length upon a consideration of this treaty. On a former occasion, in general terms, I expressed my disapproval of it. I expect to vote for the proposed amendment, which strikes out section 3. I intend to vote for the amendment to the resolution proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and then I propose to vote against the treaty.

The Senator from Massachusetts gave good and sufficient reasons for supporting the amendment proposed by him to the resolution of ratification. It would be a useless task for me to enter into an elaboration of those reasons. They could not be better stated. No question was ever better stated in this body at any period of its existence than was that question as stated by the Senator from Massachusetts a few days since. The proposition to strike out the third article or third section—

Mr. SHIVELY. Will the Senator permit me there?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SHIVELY. The Senator speaks of striking out the third. Does he mean the third article or the concluding clause of article 3?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is the concluding clause, but it has been familiarly spoken of in that way. It is the third paragraph of article 3. I shall have some suggestions to make briefly as to article 3.

My objections to the treaty are based upon broad grounds. The cry of peace has deceived more people since the beginning of governments than any other. It has generally been a cry for a cessation of hostilities until the other party could get an advantage that would insure victory.

There never has been a time in the history of the world when any progress was made through peaceful agreements. I repeat it, there has been no time in the history of the world when progress toward civilization or a higher condition of mankind was made by a contract or agreement. Every advance step toward what we term civilization to-day has been the result of war. A rule that has been tried out through so great a period of time is entitled to some respect. It ought not to be brushed aside by the novice in political or public affairs.

The American people are not clamoring for this treaty. They are not clamoring that the right of their representatives in Congress to resent aggression at the hands of a foreign foe shall be taken from their representatives. We are intermeddling with a tribunal created by the people of this country for the purpose of dealing with the questions involved here. When the people made the Constitution, acting through their States and representatives, they gave the power of declaring war to the Congress of the United States and not to the diplomatic agencies or to the treaty-making attributes or adjuncts of government. They do not mention them in connection with it. The people, speaking through their representatives in the conduct of the affairs of the Government, have the sole power to declare war, and the Executive, the President, has no option as to whether or not he will carry out the expressed intention of Congress after it has declared war. The President is not required to, nor may he, participate in the act of Congress that declares war. It does not require his signature. The people, speaking through their representatives, when that great question arises, are supreme and the President is only their agent. He becomes the Commander in Chief of the Armies, to command them in the war, and, as the civil Chief Executive, he must carry out the law of Congress that says when war shall or shall not be waged.

Now, you are proposing to take away from Congress and from the people that power, and you are proposing to substitute for that power what? Not even the Senate of the United States, not even the President of the United States, but you are proposing to substitute for the people of the United States and for their Congress a foreign tribunal, which you are pleased to term the High Court of Justice, or some such name.

Mr. LODGE. The High Commission.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; you are proposing to place the destiny of this Nation in the hands of a foreign tribunal. I will concede, for the purposes of this discussion, that it will be comprised of able, conscientious, and high-class men, but it is not possible that it can be composed in any part of Americans, as I read the article. Whenever it comes to a determination of the question of whether or not our claims shall be submitted to arbitration, that question is taken from out our hands and determined by a court of foreign sentiment and instincts and heredity. I am not willing to agree to it. We fought the Revolution in order that we might have the right to stand as a separate and sovereign Government among the nations of the earth. That was our purpose. We did not obtain that right by contract; we did not submit the question to a tribunal composed of European monarchs or their appointees. We determined it for ourselves. I am opposed to changing that method of Government. Young men or old men, it matters not, are bound to hold their lives and their strength subject to the preservation of this Government. That is the duty of citizenship; that constitutes the duty of citizenship; and for that duty we obtained many, many rights that are beyond price.

Much has been said as to the meaning of the term "justiciable," and strong arguments have been based upon it; but it seems to me that by dwelling upon that term, with its many meanings and its uncertainty of meaning, we are apt to lose sight of the real question.

No man or set of men elected by the people to carry on our Government under the Constitution are empowered to barter away any right of any part of the people of this country. They do not come here vested with any such right. We elect one of the citizens of the country as President of the United States, and he swears to uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States. Members of Congress do the same thing. That is their primary duty; to that they are bound. The right is given to the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to enter into agreements with foreign nations, which we term treaties. It requires the concurrent action of those two branches of the Government, but it was never contemplated that they should have the right or exercise the right of bartering away that most precious of all rights of the people—the right to defend their country against foreign governments. No one ever dreamed that they would exercise it.

We grow philanthropic, we grow sentimental—I had almost said "maudlin"—over "the brotherhood of man." No nation ever existed 15 minutes based upon the brotherhood of man; no community ever did. The only salvation and safety of the Nation is in fixed, arbitrary rules of right, defining the rights of the citizens in our internal affairs and defining the rights of the Government in dealing with other governments.

Suppose, for instance, that the question which was being agitated a day or two ago relative to the validity of our transactions with the Republic of Colombia, in South America, were to come into this caldron through the pathway of bonds and investments and dollars and cents claimed by an English subject; we would have to submit that question to arbitration, because it is not within the rule of the exception in this treaty; we should have to ask some three monarchs of Europe to determine whether or not we should submit that controversy between the subjects of Great Britain and our Government to their judgment in determining whether or not they had an arbitrable case.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHILTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not think the Senator from Idaho has overstated the obligation at all. The truth is that with a case like that and a claim of that character we would not be asked whether we would consent to its arbitration; we have already consented to it by this agreement, and we would simply be memorialized to name three commissioners. The initiation of that controversy rests entirely with the country with whom we have made the contract and not with us.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; that is true, Mr. President. I was citing it as one of the instances where we could be compelled to arbitrate. We would not arbitrate it. This Government will never fall so low that it will permit its action already performed, upon which a great enterprise is based and upon which the effect and vitality of the existence of that enterprise rests—we will never submit such a question to the representatives of any monarchy in the world, even though we might make 40 treaties. The people have a way of settling those questions, and they would retire from their Congress the men who had dared thus to undertake to undo that which they have ratified, and they would send men here who would know how to run a government, and dare to do it.

I only suggest that because it is a live question in this Chamber. It is only a few hours since it was urged upon us, and it is now a pending question in a committee of this body. The question raised here would be a sufficient bill upon which to present such a matter—that we had, by political jugglery, brought about a fictitious treaty that enabled us to take advantage of a government with which we were at peace in order that we might gain a pecuniary reward. I am not going to express an opinion in regard to the merits of the Colombian case. I was a Member of this body when those transactions were being considered, and what I had to say I said then. I only cite it as one of those instances that would come within the purview of this proposed treaty.

Suppose, again, that British subjects are found to have in their possession, under a claim of purchase for valuable consideration, some $700,000,000 of bonds that were issued by authority of no law of the United States and yet purporting to have behind them the faith and credit of a part of the United States, do you think this Government, in response to a demand by the subjects of Great Britain, would submit the question to arbitration as to whether or not those bonds were a legal or a moral obligation resting upon this country? Never. Congress might, in its forgetfulness, undertake to do so; but the people of the United States would make a new Congress.

Then, again, it is proposed that the matter shall rest in abeyance one year in order that the boys may determine whether or not they really want to fight. I remember a school-teacher who used to tell the boys that before they entered into a fight they should each walk around the schoolhouse in opposite directions, and if, when they met on the other side, they really wanted to fight, why, go ahead. Contention is an attribute of the human character, whether singly or in the aggregate of nations, and inasmuch as it has been a method of settling controversies between men and nations, we may consider it as one of the old-established rights and lights along the highway from the earliest civilization to the civilization of to-day and not to be lightly disregarded.

Do you suppose, Mr. President, that there would have been a nation called the United States of America to-day had this arbitration treaty been in existence? Oh, I am met with the suggestion that conditions then were peculiar; they do not exist to-day. It may truly be said that there have been no conditions existing in the history of the world that have not been repeated in other ages and which may not be repeated in the ages to come. What government on earth is the result of a contract? Can any Senator name a government that grew out of a contract between nations or parts of nations? I know of none. Are we to have no more governments? Is nothing new and good and great to be carved out of the raw material of the world from which governments have been made in the past and will be made in the future? What tribunal under the influence of monarchical ideas would have allowed the United States to take the territory we gained from Mexico? What monarchy or combination of monarchies would have allowed this great country to reach its present status as a nation? None. There is no monarchy in the world in sympathy with a republic; there never has been, and yet, like the foolish little lamb, just because the lion and the tiger and the jaguar have smooth skins and are lithe and beautiful, we are going up and lie down among them and await their appetite!

Mr. President, these treaties present a serious question, the most serious question that has ever presented itself to the American people as regards their relations with foreign nations. Think you to-day that Germany would consent to adopt our system of government? If not, it is evidence that they do not approve of it. Think you that France, which nominally is a republic, would be willing to incorporate into its system of government the real foundation principles upon which our Government rests? They had the opportunity to do so, but they did not take advantage of it. There can be no better evidence of the fact that they do not approve of it. Do you think that England, Mr. President, approves of our form of government? The best evidence that she does not is that she does not adopt it. Is there any nation on earth that does approve of our form of government? There is none—not one.

If you were going to select a jury to determine the rights of a citizen, in the first place you would want a jury composed of members who spoke the language of the contending parties in order that they might interpret it free from the embarrassing shades and distinctions that even with one who speaks another language is embarrassing. If you were going to select a jury to determine the rights between two American citizens, you would select men who have American instincts. If it involved a question of government or the interpretation or application of laws of the Government to the act of a party, you would select men who knew something of our laws and had some sympathy with them. That is not the proposition under this treaty.

It is not proposed that this court, which is to determine whether we have any cause of action—in other words, to pass upon the demurrer to the bill—it is not intended that it shall contain members who are familiar either with our institutions or who speak our language. If our representatives were so unfortunate as not to understand the language in which one or more of them expressed his ideas, he would have to have an interpreter in the court where our rights, the rights of the American people, are being determined.

The scope of the questions to be determined is startling. I have not heard reference to that part of it. Article 1 says "all differences hereafter arising under treaty or otherwise." I have omitted the intervening words of description. "All differences hereafter arising under treaty or otherwise," mark you, "and which are justiciable." I have heard several definitions given to that word here. The definition of the word "justiciable" in France, or the equivalent word there, is entirely different from the definition accepted for that word in England; and in Italy it differs from both.

Now, suppose that this joint high commission of inquiry is composed of one Frenchman, one Italian, and one German. Which of those three is to determine the extent and scope of the meaning of that word? In England they have the dual system of law and equity. In France they have not; and in Italy they have a system that ignores both. I think it was assumed in the making of this treaty with Great Britain that that word would be interpreted according to the laws of England, which are not dissimilar to ours. They have a system of equity which originated in the opinion of the guard at the door of the King's chamber in discriminating as to who should and who should not be admitted to see the King and present his grievances. That was the origin of that system, which is termed equity. Blackstone says it is to deal with those questions wherein the law by reason of its universality is deficient and insufficient to deal with it. Anything that may be disposed of by law can not come within the jurisdiction of equity, and that is the test.

Now, that is the English rule, and if the controversy was between the English people and this Government there would be no lack of harmony in the rule that should govern. But if that was to be adjudicated by three members of the joint high commission, neither of whom was in sympathy or mental touch with the rule of equity and the spirit of equity which prevail or obtain between our country and Great Britain, then we would have a tribunal lacking in knowledge and instinct, because when you are dealing with equity you are dealing with instinct.

When the importunities became so numerous that the guard at the King's door was embarrassed to determine the question, the King had to substitute a little higher-grade man for the man who was only a guard, and he did that because he wanted some one who would sift down these suppliants to a minimum in order that he might not be disturbed more than was necessary. By and by that guard at the door to the King's chamber sat as a judge to determine the questions for which there was no legal rule of disposition. By and by the King said, "You do not need to go to the door any more. You can go up to the chancellor's chambers or the court of chancery and sift out these things before you come to me at all."

I merely say that in regard to the subject, because it has been contended that no confusion could arise out of the interpretation of the term "justiciable." The language of the article undertakes in a left-handed way to give it an interpretation, but no one seems to be satisfied with the interpretation contained in the article itself. They all seem to feel that it is necessary to add something to it. I think they are right about that. It is necessary to add the ax to it and cut it out.

I want to read a word or two about that:

All differences hereafter arising under treaty or otherwise and which are justiciable in their nature by reason of being susceptible of decision by the application of the principles of law or equity shall be submitted.

That was intended to be a definition of the word "justiciable."

We will next go to the tribunal. At home we have certain constitutional rights in regard to the determination of controversies affecting the persons or the property of our citizens or of persons residing within the jurisdiction of the Government. This proposes in a class of cases to remove that right, to take away the right of trial that would ordinarily ensue, and to transfer it to a foreign tribunal.

Now, in the question of the Republic of Colombia, in the question of Hawaii, in the question of the Philippine Islands, in any of those questions the tribunal would sit in Europe, surrounded by the atmosphere and the conditions peculiar to that country. Individual rights only are at stake. Our Government has no stake except its duty to protect the rights of the citizen. So that our citizen must either throw himself with perfect faith in the arms of this foreign tribunal or he must go over there and watch it as litigants do in this country. The individual is not even permitted to be represented by counsel. The right which is guaranteed to every citizen in this country is denied to him in that great controversy where, perhaps, everything is at stake. He is deprived of the right of representation before it. Some one else makes up the issue, creates the tribunal, which is not recognized by the Constitution of the United States, and says to him, "You will be taken care of, and you will not be permitted to participate in the determination of your rights."

Now, I revert to the use of the word "arbitration." It sounds pacific, but it is not pacific. It has a kindly feeling that is calculated to carry away the churches and their congregations and the good women of the land in their social organizations. They say what? "Opposed to arbitrating matters, thus saving the people from war?" I have hundreds, and I think I may say thousands, of letters criticizing my position on this matter, generally in the shape of round robins, the filling out of blanks which have been sent out from some central point, and very often with the request, "Please copy this, so that it will not be apparent that you are merely filling out a blank." I had one yesterday, in which I think only three words were spelled correctly, asking me—not asking me, but "as your constituents we demand that you vote for these things enumerated." It is safe to say that the party sending it could not read the measure and would have no more conception of the scope of the treaty, support for which he is demanding, than would a cat.

Mr. President, I think I have reached a point in my life where I will not be carried away by that kind of sentiment or deceived by those methods. I wonder how many in the congregations of the churches in this country who are making such an arbitrary demand as to the manner of the performance of a public duty have ever seen the treaty or, seeing it, would know whether it was a chapter in the Pentateuch or from the dictionary? I am not inclined to disregard an intelligent appeal from any part of the people in regard to the performance of my duty on legislative matters, but I want it to be accompanied by some evidence of intelligent consideration, which will at least suggest to me that the people know enough about it to entitle them to be heard. I use the term "entitle them to be heard." No one in this country has any license to buzz in your ear in an irresponsible way and demand that you act responsibly.

We have The Hague treaty to-day. Japan and Russia are both parties to the treaty. Over there there is forming out of the greatest mass of unformed, unorganized government the world has ever known, either in territory or in number of inhabitants, new governments—new systems of government. God only knows what will come out of that condition—whether it will be monarchs or republics or despots. Yet we are going to tie ourselves up by this treaty to deal with them under the provisions of The Hague treaty, bearing in mind always that they are entitled to the same consideration as other nations with which we have made treaties.

Some one here expressed the hope the other day that this would result in bringing in all the nations of the earth, so that the millennium would be at hand. Can any thinking man desire that we shall have a compulsory arbitration treaty with China in its unorganized state and with the uncertainty and indefiniteness that surround that situation; that we should be compelled to arbitrate our difficulty with China or even Japan?

There is much misdirected sentiment in regard to the nation of Japan. They are great imitators. They were found practically an unknown nation on the face of the earth without anything to distinguish them from what we have been pleased to term "savages"; and through their adaptability and power of imitating they have reached a point where they really look, or try to look, like American citizens—civilized people. Because a nation may be able to throw out warships and defeat one of the older nations of the earth on land or sea, it does not follow that they are to be classed in the same category or under the same mark of civilization as the people of this country.

I would not say anything derogatory of Japan or the Japanese people. But to compare them with the American people in point of civilization or commerce is without any reasonable foundation. When they have maintained a status for a hundred years we may then begin to admit them into the outer tent for investigation to see whether or not they are ready to be recognized as a criterion for the conduct of American citizens. Are we going to deal with those people on the same basis that we would deal with England?

It was said here the other day that it was certain Japan would ask for a similar treaty to that which we are now considering, and it was suggested that China would soon be in a position to ask for it, and Italy and Persia, and would we then have to select this high joint commission from the people of those nations? Just imagine the Japanese and the Turks constituting two-thirds the membership of a tribunal to determine the destiny of this country! You submit that plain unvarnished question to the American people and see what kind of an answer you will get—the right to enter our public schools with or without our consent, the right to do anything that we may do, not under our grace, but under the manifest of powers that are as much out of sympathy with us as were those from whom we wrung the freedom of the country.

I wonder what the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] would think of selecting or allowing the present Government of Mexico to participate and furnish one of the members of the joint high tribunal to determine a question of controversy, vital to the interests of the people of this country or to their rights. I think he would object.

Now, as to the necessity for any such treaty, is it cowardice that prompts it, or is it patriotism? I repeat that. What prompts this effort? I say it without animadversion upon any man. Is it cowardice or is it patriotism? Is it because there are men in this country who are afraid that their money stacks will be toppled over by the foreign invader? Is it because there are men in this country who would rather have dishonorable peace than honorable war? That is what I call cowardice.

If it is not that, if that is too harsh a term, what other reason is there for it? Are there great questions pressing upon us that must be determined by either war or contract? What are they? Mr. President, no Senator has suggested, no message that has come to us has suggested, any cause for this extraordinary proceeding.

We have equipped this country with an Army and a Navy that is to-day quite equal to take care of its interests at home or abroad. Are we going to continue to build up and maintain these two great war forces if we make this treaty? Will we gain in an economic sense the cost of maintaining armies or building navies? It is not even pretended that we will.

I saw a message or a communication a few days since in one of the leading journals of the country from a Member close to the head of the executive department of the Government which said, "We do not contemplate for a moment that it will obviate the necessity of maintaining armies or building navies."

Then what do we gain? What are we going to do with these armies and navies? Are we to maintain them merely because they are workshops for labor, because they are a medium through which to disburse the funds resulting from the income of the Government, and allow the ships to rot at their docks or the Army to rest in its camps?

If the acquisition of the Philippine Islands was a good thing we owe it to the Navy of the United States, not in inaction but in action. If the island of Porto Rico is a valuable acquisition, we owe it to the Navy. If the acquisition of that great empire lying west of the Mississippi is desirable, we owe it to the Army. If the settlement of the disturbances on our border a few months ago was wise and desirable, we owe it to the Army. That was war.

Now, you are proposing to abolish these two great arms contemplated in the Constitution, with their duties defined, with the limitations placed upon their power and their duties provided for as to manner and form. Their creation was a part of the wisdom of the founders of our Government. Were they unwise? Why did they not propose arbitration? That would have left us at the mercy of the monarchies of the world in 1812. Why did they not? They were wise men. No one controverts the question that they were. Why did not Mr. Adams and Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Franklin and that great coterie of statesmen, who made and published the Declaration of Independence, arbitrate with Great Britain? Was it not wise in that day to arbitrate? They would have submitted it probably to Spain and Italy and Prussia. Prussia had not reached a point at that time where she would have been probably one of the arbitrators. What would have been the result? Would there have been a Government of the United States?

When the English blockade runner, in violation of the law of the country, undertook during our domestic troubles to enter our ports, that question would have had to be submitted to the arbitration of Great Britain and France and what there was of Germany in those days. I wonder how many votes a measure of that kind would receive in this body. I am speaking something of the effects of it aside from the principle. The principle involved would be quite sufficient to prevent me from voting for it, but to those who do intend to vote for it I desire to accompany the music of their response to the roll call with this analysis of the thing they are doing.

Mr. President, I am not going to protract this very much. I want it to be distinctly understood that the thing you are proposing to do is to write out of the Constitution of the United States the power of Congress to declare war. We would vote here either against the proposition of declaring war if the sentiment of the people demanded it, which would involve the disregard of a treaty, or we would have to observe the treaty and disregard the demand of the people.

It is not officeholders who have or are invested alone with the honor of this country. It was a wise reservation in making the Constitution to leave the question of the protection of the honor of the Nation to the people themselves and not to those who were temporarily in office. It was a wise provision. Men in office are snugly ensconced sometimes; they have comfortable salaries and honorable positions, and they feel so comfortable that they would hate like everything to have a war come along and disturb them. But the people, who are behind it and above it and under it and beyond it all, reserved to themselves the right to preserve their liberties and their Government, and they have accomplished it. Under the provisions of the Constitution the people can declare war, and the people only. A treaty between a foreign government and the United States can not enlarge the constitutional power of the United States. We have no constitutional power to take away from Congress the power to declare war. No treaty can take away that power nor could it add to the power. Our laws are made at home, and no one should participate in a law except the citizenship of the United States in the manner prescribed by the Constitution.

This treaty is drawn in such broad language, in the words that I called attention to, that the very fact of the existence of a controversy would lead to war. The first war that we would have after this treaty is adopted would be over the treaty, and instead of being a means of preventing war it would be the cause of a war. Some coterie of foreign nations, resentful in their spirit against the act of our people and our Government, would assume a position in regard to the rights of our people that would be in contravention of our rights, and we would fight them because they had undertaken to take away the rights of our people. That would be your treaty. It would be the war carpet on which the controversy would be wrestled out.

It must be conceded by most that section 3 must be eliminated, either in form or force, from this treaty. I do not recall having heard any Senator express himself to the contrary. We have pursued a policy of excluding certain aliens from this country for good cause. That is a question that might, under the terms of this treaty, be brought before this tribunal of strangers, and the rules that had been held by our courts in passing upon those questions would be overridden. For what? In order that a part of the people might sit snugly and smugly behind their accumulations, feeling that somebody else would fight their battles for them. That class of people have generally relied upon somebody else to fight their battles. The person who did the fighting would depend upon a pittance and the hope of a pension; the person for whom the battle was fought would reap the benefits of the victory and forget the agency that preserved him.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The suggestion of the Senator from Idaho right at that point prompts me to inquire whether the so-called Platt amendment, by which the Government of the United States undertakes to exercise a certain suzerainty over the island of Cuba, might not also become the subject of international inquiry, if article 3 is to be left in the treaty as submitted. I am prompted to say this, because it is a well-known fact that we have expended millions and millions of dollars in order that that island might be free, and having enjoined upon them certain conditions for the maintenance of that freedom we have elected to say that it shall not be within the power of that sovereign State to contract any obligation that would in any way impair her sovereignty. If that question could not be inquired into by a tribunal such as is sought to be superimposed upon us by article 3, I do not know of a controversy that does come within its jurisdiction. In other words, if the Senator will indulge me, we are embarking upon a general scheme of international meddlesomeness, which begins nowhere and ends nowhere; and I make the declaration without fear of contradiction, that if we pass this treaty in the form in which it comes to us to-day there is not a Senator in this body who can tell what questions we have resolved to arbitrate with Great Britain and France.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I started to enumerate accepted conditions that might come within the scope of this treaty, and I found my list growing so long that I abandoned it and concluded not to undertake to enumerate them all. Of course, the question suggested by the Senator from Michigan is one that would come clearly within the purview of this performance, if I may so designate it.

I would not like to see this debate close without the RECORD reciting the principle that was recognized at the beginning of our Government. We certainly must not forget that authority nor the wisdom of that period. It is fashionable in some sections of the country to minimize the wisdom and the services of George Washington. I have been ashamed sometimes when I heard in public address a reference to him as though he was a subject to be apologized for. He did not please certain people of his day who happened to be writers, and many of them spoke of him with tolerance, when, as a matter of fact, while they had been indulging in the pleasures of life and inactivities George Washington was busy mentally and physically. No man of his age was better trained mentally, better equipped mentally, to participate in the formation of a Government than George Washington. Through his familiarity with the English Government of that day he knew what to do to correct the evils that it stood for, and he knew how to do it.

Nobody ever heard of him proposing a treaty with England. He drew his sword and went into the battle, and for eight years he sustained that cause by his personal intelligence and integrity and bravery. I wish I could state all three words at once, because one is not entitled to precedence over the other. And when that battle was ended he did not go back and settle down to enjoy comfort and ease. He had furnished money to the Government to carry on the strife in its hour of need, and he went back to Virginia, and he stands responsible in history for Virginia's adoption of the Constitution of the United States. When jealousies had grown up—and I say it without any disrespect to the great State of Virginia—when jealousies had grown up in Virginia over the terms of the Constitution, it was George Washington who went back there and made a campaign from neighborhood to neighborhood, talking with his fellow citizens personally and in groups, urging upon them the necessity for action in adopting the Constitution. Yet I have heard persons sneer at him, and I have read their sneers.

Then during the time when the Constitutional Convention was in session the master minds of that convention included George Washington. He sat there presiding over the deliberations of the Constitutional Convention, adding and aiding as a member of the convention by his wisdom and his experience. We owe much of the wisdom of that instrument to the conservative and wise intelligence of George Washington. And when the Government had been made, when it had been wrested from monarchy through his efforts—and I say "through his efforts" without discrediting or detracting from the credit due to every man who bore arms—when the freedom of this country from English rule was an accomplished thing, and he had taken up the question of establishing a civil government, his mind was filled with wisdom that directed and guided and controlled great men who were associated with him.

Did you ever read his correspondence at the time the adoption of the Constitution was under consideration? I commend it to those who have not pondered it and who would slur the part that Washington took in civil affairs.

He left a message that will find a welcome and a resting place in the heart of every thoughtful and patriotic American citizen, in which he warned the people of that day, and of the days to follow, against the very thing that is proposed to be done by this treaty. I am going to close what I have to say by calling attention to a few of the things he did say. He says: "A government belongs to the people and not to office holders." There is a wisdom there that is as far-reaching as any spoken utterance of the human tongue, and that is often forgotten. He said:

Real patriots who may resist the intrigues of the favorite are liable to become suspected and odious, while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people to surrender their interests.

That is just as true to-day as it was then. That is a sign post; it is a danger signal; it is to put us on guard that we are not to mistake the flambeau for the fort, the light for the solid earth. Then he says:

Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Just look to-day at the condition of things in Europe. He says further:

Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalry, interest, humor, or caprice?

That question is as pertinent to-day as it was then.

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances—

I am reading the words of George Washington:

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances with any portion of the foreign world, so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it.

He had reference, of course, to certain undefined relations then existing with France.

It is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character.

Here we yield up our independent and sovereign right to be governed by the sense of wisdom that marks the hour of controversy because we promised somebody we would do it. Is that becoming a Nation like ours? He says:

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence—I conjure you to believe me, fellow citizens—the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government.

They forget that we are a Republic who undertake to make a contract with a foreign nation with a different form of government, with different traditions, with different impulses. They would bind us so that in the hour of trial we might be compelled to share in perpetrating an injustice upon a lesser nation, or in joining in war with which we should have no sympathy, merely because one generation and one administration had, in their zeal to set their flag high in glory, undertaken to do something because it was odd and unusual.

Mr. President, no one who loves his country and who wants to feel that it will outlive him in the generations and the centuries that follow can look calmly on while such a humiliating contract as this is being entered into. Are we afraid to stand out in the open among the nations of the earth? Are we distrustful of the wisdom of the hour when these questions shall arise?

Do we think that the generations that will follow us will not be capable of coping with questions of the future that we should in this day attempt to hold their hands? When they discover the bands upon their wrists that we have sought to fasten there they will throw them off, and they will throw off the high opinion and the sacred memory of the generation that dared thus underestimate them or their ability to conduct the affairs of the Nation, of the American people.

I hope that this treaty will not become a law of this land. If it does, I shall pray for the wisdom of the generations that shall follow this, whose aim is rather the preservation of the principles of our Government than the ambition to be written among those who held place and were given honor by the people.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH of Michigan in the chair). The question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, if the Senator from Mississippi is to speak, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Curtis	McCumber	Root
Bailey	Dillingham	McLean	Shively
Borah	du Pont	Martin, Va.	Simmons
Bourne	Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Bradley	Foster	Myers	Smith, Md.
Briggs	Gallinger	Nelson	Smith, Mich.
Bristow	Gardner	Nixon	Smith, S. C.
Brown	Gore	O'Gorman	Smoot
Bryan	Gronna	Oliver	Stephenson
Burnham	Guggenheim	Overman	Sutherland
Burton	Heyburn	Page	Swanson
Chamberlain	Hitchcock	Paynter	Thornton
Chilton	Johnson, Me.	Penrose	Tillman
Clapp	Johnston, Ala.	Percy	Townsend
Clark, Wyo.	Jones	Perkins	Warren
Clarke, Ark.	Kern	Poindexter	Watson
Crane	Lea	Pomerene	Wetmore
Crawford	Lippitt	Rayner	Williams
Culberson	Lodge	Reed	Works
Cullom	Lorimer	Richardson

Mr. LEA. I desire to state that the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR] is necessarily absent from the Chamber.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I desire to again state that my colleague [Mr. GAMBLE] is necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I was not astonished to ascertain that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] was opposed to either of these treaties. I rather imagined that it would distress the soul of the Senator from Idaho by any present agreement of any sort to prevent the possibility of any future controversy. I had hoped not to be compelled to speak until I had heard the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], because I understand that he is going to attempt to show that there is a possibility under these treaties of the arbitration of repudiated or scaled State bonds, and as I have never heard one good reason in support of that position I had hoped that I could hear the Senator from Georgia upon it, and then to reply to what he had to say. It seemed evident, however, by his keeping his seat that we were about to proceed to a vote, and I thought there were some things that I wanted to say, especially in connection with those bonds. The other day I had prepared to speak immediately after the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] had sat down, but found that I could not do so.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH of Michigan in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BACON. I simply desire to say to the Senator from Mississippi that I do expect to endeavor to support that proposition before the Senate, and I hope that after I present my views the Senator from Mississippi will still have the opportunity to reply.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I shall go on, then, first, with the general discussion of the treaties.

It has struck me that it would be a good idea to publish the text of the Anglo-American treaty of arbitration, signed at Washington on August 3, 1911, underscoring, so that they shall be printed in italics, those parts of the treaty which are decisive of the controversies that have arisen concerning it. In that way any reader of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will have called to his attention the parts which have given rise to argument. I therefore ask that here in my remarks, in the forefront of what I have to say, the treaty with Great Britain shall be published in that manner. I have underscored the parts to which I refer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request of the Senator from Mississippi will be taken as the sense of the Senate unless there is objection. The Chair hears none.

The treaty with Great Britain, italicized as directed, is as follows:

The United States of America and His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India, being equally desirous of perpetuating the peace, which has happily existed between the two nations, as established in 1814 by the Treaty of Ghent, and has never since been interrupted by an appeal to arms, and which has been confirmed and strengthened in recent years by a number of treaties whereby pending controversies have been adjusted by agreement or settled by arbitration or otherwise provided for; so that now for the first time there are no important questions of difference outstanding between them, and being resolved that no future differences shall be a cause of hostilities between them or interrupt their good relations and friendship:

The High Contracting Parties have, therefore, determined, in furtherance of these ends, to conclude a treaty extending the scope and obligations of the policy of arbitration adopted in their present arbitration treaty of April 4, 1908, so as to exclude certain exceptions contained in that treaty and to provide means for the peaceful solution of all questions of difference which it shall be found impossible in future to settle by diplomacy, and for that purpose they have appointed as their respective Plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America, the Honorable Philander C. Knox, Secretary of State of the United States; and His Britannic Majesty, the Right Honorable James Bryce, O. M., his Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary at Washington; Who, having communicated to one another their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

All differences hereafter arising between the High Contracting Parties, which it has not been possible to adjust by diplomacy, relating to international matters in which the High Contracting Parties are concerned by virtue of a claim of right made by one against the other under treaty or otherwise, and which are justiciable in their nature by reason of being susceptible of decision by the application of the principles of law or equity, shall be submitted to the Permanent Court of Arbitration established at The Hague by the Convention of October 18, 1907, or to some other arbitral tribunal, as shall [may] be decided in each case by special agreement, which special agreement shall provide for the organization of such tribunal if necessary, define the scope of the powers of the arbitrators, the question or questions at issue, and settle the terms of reference and the procedure thereunder.

The provisions of Articles 37 to 90, inclusive, of the Convention for the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes concluded at The Second Peace Conference at The Hague on the 18th October, 1907, so far as applicable, and unless they are inconsistent with or modified by the provisions of the special agreement to be concluded in each case, and excepting Articles 53 and 54 of such Convention, shall govern the arbitration proceedings to be taken under this Treaty.

The special agreement in each case shall be made on the part of the United States by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, His Majesty's Government reserving the right before concluding a special agreement in any matter affecting the interests of a self-governing dominion of the British Empire to obtain the concurrence therein of the government of that dominion.

Such agreements shall be binding when confirmed by the two Governments by an exchange of notes.

ARTICLE II.

The High Contracting Parties further agree to institute as occasion arises, and as hereinafter provided, a Joint High Commission of Inquiry to which, upon the request of either Party, shall be referred for impartial and conscientious investigation any controversy between the Parties within the scope of Article I, before such controversy has been submitted to arbitration, and also any other controversy hereafter arising between them even if they are not agreed that it falls within the scope of Article I; provided, however, that such reference may be postponed until the expiration of one year after the date of the formal request therefor, in order to afford an opportunity for diplomatic discussion and adjustment of the questions in controversy, if either Party desires such postponement.

Whenever a question or matter of difference is referred to the Joint High Commission of Inquiry, as herein provided, each of the High Contracting Parties shall designate three of its nationals to act as members of the Commission of Inquiry for the purposes of such reference; or the Commission may be otherwise constituted in any particular case by the terms of reference, the membership of the Commission and the terms of reference to be determined in each case by an exchange of notes.

The provisions of Articles 9 to 36, inclusive, of the Convention for the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes concluded at The Hague on the 18th October, 1907, so far as applicable and unless they are inconsistent with the provisions of this Treaty, or are modified by the terms of reference agreed upon in any particular case, shall govern the organization and procedure of the Commission.

ARTICLE III.

The Joint High Commission of Inquiry, instituted in each case as provided for in Article II, is authorized to examine into and report upon the particular questions or matters referred to it, for the purpose of facilitating the solution of disputes by elucidating the facts, and to define the issues presented by such questions, and also to include in its report such recommendations and conclusions as may be appropriate.

The reports of the Commission shall not be regarded as decisions of the questions or matters so submitted either on the facts or on the law and shall in no way have the character of an arbitral award.

[It is further agreed, however, that in cases in which the Parties disagree as to whether or not a difference is subject to arbitration under Article I of this Treaty, that question shall be submitted to the Joint High Commission of Inquiry; and if all or all but one of the members of the Commission agree and report that such difference is within the scope of Article I, it shall be referred to arbitration in accordance with the provisions of this Treaty.]

ARTICLE IV.

The Commission shall have power to administer oaths to witnesses and take evidence on oath whenever deemed necessary in any proceeding, or inquiry, or matter within its jurisdiction under this Treaty; and the High Contracting Parties agree to adopt such legislation as may be appropriate and necessary to give the Commission the powers above mentioned, and to provide for the issue of subpoenas and for compelling the attendance of witnesses in the proceedings before the Commission.

On the inquiry both sides must be heard, and each Party is entitled to appoint an Agent, whose duty it shall be to represent his Government before the Commission and to present to the Commission, either personally or through counsel retained for that purpose, such evidence and arguments as he may deem necessary and appropriate for the information of the Commission.

ARTICLE V.

The Commission shall meet whenever called upon to make an examination and report under the terms of this Treaty, and the Commission may fix such times and places for its meetings as may be necessary, subject at all times to special call or direction of the two Governments. Each Commissioner, upon the first joint meeting of the Commission after his appointment, shall, before proceeding with the work of the Commission, make and subscribe a solemn declaration in writing that he will faithfully and impartially perform the duties imposed upon him under this Treaty, and such declaration shall be entered on the records of the proceedings of the Commission.

The United States and British sections of the Commission may each appoint a secretary, and these shall act as joint secretaries of the Commission at its joint sessions, and the Commission may employ experts and clerical assistants from time to time as it may deem advisable. The salaries and personal expenses of the Commission and of the agents and counsel and of the secretaries shall be paid by their respective Governments and all reasonable and necessary joint expenses of the Commission incurred by it shall be paid in equal moieties by the High Contracting Parties.

ARTICLE VI.

This Treaty shall supersede the Arbitration Treaty concluded between the High Contracting Parties on April 4, 1908, but all agreements, awards, and proceedings under that Treaty shall continue in force and effect and this Treaty shall not affect in any way the provisions of the treaty of January 11, 1909, relating to questions arising between the United States and the Dominion of Canada.

ARTICLE VII.

The present Treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty. The ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington as soon as possible and the Treaty shall take effect on the date of the exchange of its ratifications. It shall thereafter remain in force continuously unless and until terminated by twenty-four months' written notice given by either High Contracting Party to the other.

In faith whereof the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed this Treaty in duplicate and have hereunto affixed their seals.

Done at Washington the third day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and eleven.

PHILANDER C. KNOX.
JAMES BRYCE.

I certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the original treaty this day signed.

PHILANDER C. KNOX,
Secretary of State.

AUGUST 3, 1911.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. President, Article I, in setting forth the differences which shall be arbitrable, confines them, as you will see from my italics, first, to "questions hereafter arising"; second, to "differences" relating to "international matters"; and, third—and remember it is "and" and not "or"—to differences which are "justiciable in their nature by reason of being susceptible of decision by the application of the principles of law or equity."

Great Prince of Peace! Mr. President, is not all that confinement enough? Men are awfully particular about binding themselves not to hurt one another, and men are awfully careless about the sufficiency of the cause when the time comes where there is an opportunity to hurt one another. Attention to the quoted words italicized in the body of the treaty would have saved a great deal of trouble to those people upon the Pacific coast who have been worrying themselves about the question of mixed schools for the races. That question is not only a purely domestic one, but it is domestic in the sense that the States have entire jurisdiction over it. It is not an international question; it is not even a national question; and nothing can become international with us which has not previously somewhere or somehow been first national.

REGARD to the same words would have saved much anxiety to those who are troubling themselves about the labor question in connection with Japanese immigration. The question of the admission of alien immigrants could never become an international question, although the question of the treatment of alien laborers after they have entered the country might become one, just as the treatment of Italians by the mob in New Orleans did.

Attention to the second lot of words italicized would have saved those who have been troubling themselves lest the Monroe doctrine might be arbitrated. The Monroe doctrine, as its name indicates, is an American policy or doctrine. It is not a question "susceptible of decision by the application of the principles of law or equity." The doctrine did not arise out of law or equity, and does not depend on law or equity; and no law can be appealed to to sustain or to destroy it, not even what we call international law; nor is the Monroe doctrine in itself, although some phase arising under it might be, "a question hereafter arising."

Mr. President, I have next italicized the provision of Article I which reads as follows:

As may be decided in each case by special agreement.

That is that part of the treaty which says that when a question is submitted to arbitration it shall be submitted either to the court at The Hague or else to three nationals of each disputant, as may be decided by special agreement.

I have italicized the words which show that this special agreement shall in each case do what?

Define the scope of the powers of the arbitrators, the question or questions at issue.

Those words I have italicized. Mark you, the treaty reads "in each case"; that is, in the case where arbitration comes from the decision of the joint high commission after our Executive has denied the justiciableness of the question, as well as in the case where the President or Executive has admitted the justiciableness of the question.

This is especially of importance because in next to the last clause of Article I occurs other language, which I have also italicized, reciting that—

The special agreement in each case shall be made on the part of the United States by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof.

The question thus presents itself: In one set of cases the President says, "This is a justiciable question." The Senate does not decide that it is justiciable; the President decides it. In the other case, the President deciding that it is not justiciable, the matter goes to a commission, which sits in arbitration upon its justiciableness. In neither case does the Senate sit in judgment upon that question, but in both cases the Senate delegates the power to another instrumentality to decide whether the question is justiciable. In ordinary cases that instrumentality is the President of the United States; in extraordinary cases that instrumentality is the joint high commission. If there be any delegation of the power of the Senate amounting to an abrogation of its prerogatives in the one case, there is an equal delegation amounting to an equal abrogation of its prerogatives in the other case. In each case the matter must come back to the Senate in order that it shall enter into "a special agreement"; and the special agreement "in each case" determines, first, whether it shall go to the court of The Hague or whether it shall go to a commission composed of three nationals of each side, and, in the next case, in this special agreement in each case the Senate fixes the scope of the inquiry and powers of the arbitrators.

All this, taken together, I think, preserves the prerogatives of the Senate. Who can imagine the United States Senate, while "defining the scope of the arbitrators" or designating "the question or questions at issue," submitting the Monroe doctrine, or any phase of it, as one of the questions falling within the scope of any board of arbitrators, no matter how the arbitral tribunal be organized, whether it be the permanent court of arbitration at The Hague or the other arbitral tribunal to be decided upon by "special agreement"? Not even a man could conceive that whose conception was strong enough to enable him first to conceive—and this is a difficult conception—of a President who would concede the Monroe doctrine to be justiciable or of two American nationals upon a joint high commission who would concede the Monroe doctrine, or any phase of it, to be justiciable.

The language about the "special agreement," the "scope of the powers," and the "question or questions at issue" is of yet more importance when you come to read the language, which I have also italicized, in Article II, reading:

A joint high commission of inquiry to which, upon the request of either party, shall be referred for impartial and conscientious investigation any controversy between the parties within the scope of Article I.

And when both are taken in connection with the subsequent language in the last clause of Article III, which is the gravamen of the objection of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], to wit:

It is further agreed, however, that in cases in which the parties disagree as to whether or not a difference is subject to arbitration under Article I of this treaty that question—

That is, to wit, a question of the interpretation of the treaty, a question of whether or not the particular question is subject to arbitration, whether it is justiciable—

That question shall be submitted to the joint high commission of inquiry; and if all, or all but one, of the members of the commission agree and report that such difference is within the scope of Article I, it shall be referred to arbitration—

"Referred to arbitration," how? Mark the language immediately following:

In accordance with the provisions of this treaty.

By referring back to the language underscored in article 1 you will find that the expression "in accordance with the provisions of this treaty" means that it is to be arbitrated "either by the permanent court at The Hague or by some other arbitral tribunal, as may be decided in each case by special agreement," and that that special agreement shall "define the scope of the powers of the arbitrators" and "the question or questions at issue"; and from another clause which I have underscored in Article I it is expressly provided that "the special agreement in each case shall be made on the part of the United States by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof." In other words, even if all three of the American members of the joint high commission, or two of them, decide that a question is justiciable—and it is not to be conceived that they would arrive at such a conclusion with regard to any phase of the Monroe doctrine, or with regard to our undoubted right to fix the conditions for the admission of immigrants, or with regard to public schools in a State, or with regard to the payment of debts repudiated by a State—but even if all three of them, or all but one of the American members of the commission appointed by our President, who had previously come to the conclusion that this question was not arbitrable, and confirmed by our Senate—because all appointees of the President must be so confirmed and limited in the scope of their authority by us—should decide that the question was "justiciable," what would it amount to more than this: That the question would be referred to arbitration "in accordance with the provisions of the treaty"; that is, by "a special agreement made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," just as if the question or difference about justiciableness had never arisen at all, and just as if the President in the beginning had held that the question was justiciable. The prerogatives of the Senate are saved, and the Senate has the last word. If the Senate surrender anything by leaving the commission to determine justiciableness in one case, it surrenders just as much by leaving the President to determine justiciableness in the other case. It not only has the last word, but it has the second word in the process, because the men appointed as the American commissioners are to be confirmed by the Senate, or else, if the matter is left to The Hague tribunal, that tribunal has to be constituted as the arbitral tribunal "by special agreement" made "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

As if doubly to guard the point, note the language emphasized in Article III concerning the functions and the limitations of the functions of the joint high commission with regard to its duties other than that of deciding a dispute of interpretation as to justiciableness. What is its authority and its limitations in these other regards? First, it is "authorized to examine into and report upon matters referred to it." For what purpose? Solely for the purpose of "facilitating the solution of disputes," first, by "elucidating the facts" and, secondly, by "defining the issues presented by the question submitted to it"; and as if trebly to guard the same point, note the language to which I call your attention in Article III, to wit:

The reports of the commission shall not be regarded as decisions of the questions or matters so submitted, either on the facts or on the law, and shall in no way have the character of an arbitral award.

Now, it is true that that language refers to the other duties of the joint high commission and not to the specific duty of deciding the arbitrability or justiciableness of a given question, but it is persuasive. The truth is, Mr. President, the creation of the joint high commission is the most valuable part of this treaty, not because of what that commission can do, but because of what it can delay, and the provisions for it ought in no measure, in my opinion, to be emasculated. It gives cooling time, because the first clause in Article II provides that a reference to the commission, "even when requested by one of the parties," may be postponed by the other or by either for a whole year "after the date of the formal request," so as to give "cooling time," or, to use the language of the treaty, "in order to afford an opportunity for diplomatic discussion and adjustment."

Now, let us take a case. Suppose some country would want to arbitrate some phase of the Monroe doctrine or any other question that we do not consider justiciable and that our President did not so consider. Imagine a country with diplomats so ignorant as not to know the difference between a policy of hemispheric hegemony and an international question "susceptible of decision by principles of law and equity" making such a proposition! At once it would be met by the United States Government's claim that the Monroe doctrine was not "justiciable"; that is, not arbitrable under the treaty, which says that only "justiciable" questions, "international questions," and "questions hereafter arising" are arbitrable. The next step, if the other party to the treaty desired to proceed further and if it were not thus settled by "diplomatic exchange of views," would be its request under the treaty for the appointment of a joint high commission to investigate and report whether or not the Monroe doctrine is a justiciable question. Then would come the year's "cooling time," if we wished. After that, in order that the joint high commission might determine that question in the affirmative, so as to have it referred to arbitration, at least two out of the three American members of the joint high commission would have to vote that the Monroe doctrine was a justiciable question.

Now, Mr. President, I might rest this whole controversy upon the doctrine of chances, and simply say that all this constitutes so nearly no chance at all of anything of that sort occurring that we might apply the legal maxim de minimis non curat lex to the whole controversy. I am aware that under certain circumstances the controversy might theoretically go to the regular tribunal of The Hague instead of to the tribunal of the three nationals, but you must remember that whether it goes to the three nationals depends entirely upon us and our position in the premises. We have the right under this treaty to demand in any case the tribunal of the three nationals. Without a "special agreement" made by us it could not go to any other tribunal.

Mr. President, this will be borne home a fortiori to your memories when you remember that the President appointing these three American commissioners would in such a case have previously held the question nonjusticiable and presumably would have appointed men who would hold the same way. I have a right to infer that from an ordinary knowledge of human nature. Men opposing this treaty are awfully careful about fixing conditions preventing occasions for getting into a row with one another; they are awfully careful beforehand about prescribing how not to shed one another's blood.

Can any human being, possessed of ordinary reason and a modicum of knowledge concerning the manner in which the members of the joint high commission are to be appointed, the rules governing ordinary human nature—especially as applied to Americans in connection with this question, of which they have made a fetish—and possessing a modicum of knowledge of international law, conceive that it would ever be possible that two out of the three American members of the commission thus appointed and thus confirmed would so report? Furthermore, can anybody imagine that if they did so report, the Senate of the United States would enter into the "special agreement" made necessary by the treaty "in each case," in order to specify the tribunal of arbitration and define its scope so as to include the Monroe doctrine?

Now, I am aware that the answer to that is that the Senate would then be guilty of bad faith, because it is under every moral obligation to arbitrate, but I say if the question be of such great and critical importance as to justify in the Senate's opinion war rather than to arbitrate it, we would be in no worse condition after we had agreed to arbitrate questions of another character, concluding that this did not fall within the scope, than we would be if there had been no treaty or any agreement of any description. On the contrary, we would be in a better condition. When I use the term "better condition" I mean a condition better calculated to maintain international peace.

I am willing to confess that if a case of that sort could possibly present itself to the Senate of the United States, the Senate of the United States would sweep treaty obligations and everything else to the winds and would not adopt the special agreement. I do not mean by that they would pass resolutions refusing to adopt it, either. I mean merely that they would carry it over and over from day to day and leave the matter where it previously was—subject to diplomatic disposition. But the chance of the occurrence of the contingency is so infinitesimal that to my mind it can be ignored.

A great many people in some of the States have been either giving themselves a great deal of anxiety, or have, because of ulterior motives, been attempting to arouse anxiety in the minds of others concerning the question of the submission to arbitration of the "carpet-bag" debts saddled upon the southern people during the saturnalia of reconstruction, with its rapine, fraud, and bankruptcy, and afterwards sealed by them. Two considerations would have avoided this trouble. First, that no government is called upon to submit to arbitration, under a treaty to submit "differences between the high contracting parties," any question, except it be a question constituting a "difference" between itself and the other government, or a claim against itself by that other or its national. If there be foreign bondholders who have felt outraged by the action of the States in refusing to pay fraudulent reconstruction debts, there is a difference between them and the State which refused to pay, but no difference "justiciable" or otherwise between them and the United States. There is a claim by them against the State, not the United States. You might as well talk about the United States arbitrating a claim against an American corporation or against me. The credit was extended to the State with full knowledge that the United States had nothing to do with it. Even in the case of a Territory controlled by Congress this question has been decided and adjudicated as far as an international decision can amount to an adjudication.

I want right here to take a minute or two of the time of the Senate to read from this volume which I hold in my hand, volume 4 of Moore's History of International Arbitration, wherein, on page 3608, will be found the umpire's decision in a case between ourselves and Great Britain involving the claim of holders of State bonds. The case was before a joint mixed commission. Senators who are interested in it will find the argument on both sides—the argument of the bondholders and the argument of the American representative. But here is the decision of the umpire. There are two cases. The first one I am going to read is the case of Florida. I will come to a Texas case in a minute. This was a case where Florida had contracted the debt and issued bonds while she was a Territory and when the President of the United States appointed her governor and the Congress of the United States had a veto upon her legislation. There is nowhere in any of this, even an intimation, that if the bonds had been issued by Florida while she was a State, the claimant would have thought that there was any case for arbitration against the United States. This claim is founded solely upon the idea that the United States Congress, having the veto power over the acts of the Territorial legislature and the President of the United States having the appointment of the governor and he having a veto, was responsible, because it was a party in that indirect way to the issuance of the bonds. And yet in this case the arbitrator says:

This claim has been brought before the commissioners by the holders of bonds issued by the "Territory of Florida" while it was under a Territorial government and before Florida was admitted into the Union as one of the States of the United States.

At the time of the issue of the bonds in question the Territory was governed by a legislative council chosen by the people, the governor being appointed by the President of the United States. All the acts or laws of the legislative council were required, by the law of the United States, to be laid before Congress and, if not disapproved of, they became law in Florida.

For one portion of these bonds the claimants contended that, by the right which Congress claimed to reject or veto any law passed by the legislative council of Florida, the United States Government rendered itself liable to pay the interest and principal of these bonds should Florida fail to do so.

I shall ask to have as much as I have marked published before I go to this, which I shall now read. What I was reading then was a statement of the case.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The request of the Senator from Mississippi will be complied with unless there is objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The matter referred to, which immediately follows what I have read, is as follows:

For another portion of the bonds the claim on this ground was abandoned, and their claim was based on the fact that the United States had, in the session of Congress of 1843-44, admitted Florida into the Union with a constitution having the following clause in it: "No greater amount of tax or revenue shall at any time be levied than may be required for the necessary expenses of the government." (Article 8 of Florida constitution.)

The first ground of claim need hardly be treated seriously; it might as well be contended that the British Government is responsible for all the Canadian debentures, because all the acts passed by the Canadian Parliament require the sanction of the home Government before they become laws. It will be seen, however, that at the time these bonds were bought it was never imagined by the buyers that the United States were in any way liable.

With regard to the second ground of claim—that the United States by having admitted Florida into the Union as a State, with the article in her constitution above referred to, were rendered liable to pay the debts of Florida—it may be remarked that Congress could not justly refuse to admit Florida into the Union with such a constitution; there was nothing in it contrary (to) or in violation of the Constitution of the United States; Congress had only the power to fix the time of admission and reject any constitution that was contrary to the Constitution of the United States; nor does it appear that the bondholders are in any way damaged by this article in the constitution of Florida.

Now, the umpire goes on, on page 3610:

It has been urged that there is no way of getting at a State government except through the Government of the United States. This is a mistake. There is no difficulty in the way of individuals dealing with the separate States in any matters that concern the State alone. Nearly all the States have public works and contract loans with individuals, American and foreign, and any person aggrieved may petition the governor or legislature for relief. A State can not deal with a foreign government; the intercourse with foreign nations belongs to the General Government.

To show that the Florida bondholders never supposed the United States in any way responsible, attention is called to the prospectus issued by the agents for the sale of the bonds, created for the Union Bank.

Now, the prospectus I need not read. The umpire goes on, after setting forth the prospectus:

The securities enumerated in this document are four, and they were ample if honestly administered; but not the slightest allusion is made to any liability of the United States, nor is there discoverable the smallest foundation for the claim of the bondholders before this commission, which is constituted for the purpose of settling the claims of British subjects.

Now, mark the language:

Which is constituted for the purpose of settling the claims of British subjects against the Government of the United States.

Mark the language of this treaty, so nearly identical:

Differences arising between the high contracting parties—

I resume the reading—or of the citizens of the United States against the British Government. The bondholders have a just claim on the State of Florida; they have lent their money at a fair rate of interest, and the State is bound by every principle of honor to pay interest and principal; and it is to be hoped that, sooner or later, the people of Florida will discover that honesty is the best policy, and that no State can be called respectable that does not honorably fulfill its engagements.

But all the same they—the mixed commission—decided that the United States Government had nothing to do with those bonds. They were originally Territorial bonds, coming over from Florida as a Territory to Florida as a State. A stronger case against my contention that if the bonds had been issued by Florida as a State, because the United States are a part of the government of a Territory, having a double veto on its acts.

Now, I want to call your attention to the Texas case. This you will find on page 3594, beginning on page 3591 of the same volume.

I read from page 3594:

The umpire appointed agreeably to the provisions of the convention entered into between Great Britain and the United States on the 8th of February, 1853, for the adjustment of claims by a mixed commission—

The other day, when I called attention to this, the Senator from Georgia said it was a claim. I replied, yes; in the name of common sense what question concerning bonds could be submitted to an arbiter except that which was in the nature of a claim, and these repudiated carpet-bag bonds would be no less so, and no more so, than these Florida and Texas bonds were—having been duly notified by the commissioners under the said convention that they had been unable to agree upon the decision to be given with reference to the claims of the heirs of James Holford—against the United States in relation to Texan bonds, and having carefully examined and considered the papers and evidence produced on the hearing of the said claim, and having conferred with the said commissioners thereon, hereby reports that this commission can not entertain the claim, it being for transactions with the independent Republic of Texas prior to its admission as a State of the United States.

He was the bondholder—

Now, then, this question came up in that case: The United States had in the meanwhile, after the issuance of the bonds, admitted Texas to the Union, and they had not only done that, but had made an agreement that Texas should retain her public lands and that Texas was to pay her own debt. So the bondholders urged that those two things were a sort of condition for one another, do you not understand, and in that way the United States Government was more or less directly bound.

They made another plea, still more urgent, that the United States Government later on purchased from the State of Texas a certain disputed area and agreed to pay therefor $10,000,000, and had kept $5,000,000 of that sum in the Treasury of the United States, and they contended because the United States had the $5,000,000 in hand they ought to be accountable at least to that extent; but the mixed commission decided that the arbitration treaty was a treaty to adjust differences between the United States and the nationals of Great Britain and not between the State of Texas and the nationals of Great Britain. Now, let me go on with my argument.

If any arbitration on this question of State bonds is ever to be had, it will be by a board evoked and agreed upon by and between the respective States and the bondholders, the parties at difference. That may now be had at any time when the two—they were the high contracting parties in that case—agree to have it.

The intervention of the United States Government is not only not necessary, but would be at once absurd and insolent. Second, it is not only true amongst individuals, but it is true amongst nations that "no one can plead ignorance of the law." Every civilized nation in the world knows that this is not a government of unlimited powers, and knows that it is a government of a dual character, and that the Federal Government possesses only such powers as are delegated to it by the people in the Constitution creating it, and that it can, therefore, as a government refer to arbitration only those questions over which jurisdiction is vested in it as a government. It is true that with regard to international affairs—questions solely international—the Government of the United States is one of plenary power, but this is true only when the question is a question between the United States and a foreign power; that is, when the question is really an "international question," and one to which the Government of the United States is a party.

That is, a question between the United States and a foreign power, one to which the United States is a party. Even Great Britain in this very treaty preserves the right in case any interest of her self-governing colonies are affected, to consult them before submitting to arbitration. She had to make that reservation, because she has not admitted any rights of sovereignty in her so-called self-governing colonies; but we did not have to express it in the treaty, because we published it to the world in the Constitution of the United States, presumably known to men intelligent enough to be diplomats.

If Canada should repudiate her bonds, under this very treaty, no American citizen could secure arbitration of that question under this treaty unless Canada consented to it.

One more point. The President and two-thirds of the Senate can no more pass a treaty changing, altering, or amending the Constitution of the United States than the President and the two Houses could do the same thing by ordinary law. A treaty after all, as John Marshall said, is like any other law of the Federal Government, to wit, it is "the supreme law of the land," but only when "made in pursuance of the Constitution" of the United States; and any competent Federal court would have no hesitancy in declaring a treaty, usurpatory of Federal power, unconstitutional, just as it would declare any other law, thus usurpatory, unconstitutional; all this, even if one could conceive that the President or two out of three American nationals and the Senate by special agreement would or could agree to leave such a question to arbitration, and furthermore could conceive that the Senate would confirm arbitrators who were capable of deciding that way.

What I have said above as regards the position of the Government of the United States, if it were attempted to submit to arbitration the question of the refusal to pay State debts, is based upon the assumption that the arbitration would be made with a view to binding the State and thereby forcing it to pay a debt which the authorities of the State and the people of the State had considered fraudulent. Of course, there is a sense in which the United States Government might undertake, if it chose, to submit to arbitration the question of the payment of the amount of a State debt, and might pay it in consequence of a decision of an arbitral tribunal, but, if it did, the question would not be whether the State should pay the debt or not, nor in anywise a question of binding the State, but whether the United States, of its own free grace, would pay the debt. If they, the United States, did pay the debt, they would have no way of recovering it from the State, either by the force of the treaty, or by a subsequent act of Congress, or by process in the courts. This is all to plain to my mind. The United States Government might, out of charity, generosity, or magnanimity, with a view of purchasing friendship, or for some other free grace reason, agree by treaty to pay any nation any sum of money already gathered into its Treasury, and which therefore had already become its "property," of which it could "dispose," provided that the Congress of the United States, after the agreement by treaty to pay it, would pass a law appropriating the sum. The fact that this sum happened to be the amount of a State debt, and that that happened to be the reason why the United States Government chose to give away the sum, would not affect the right "by law" to "dispose of" money in the Treasury. This proceeds upon the theory that money in the Treasury is, in the sense of the constitutional clause, "the property of the United States" and can therefore be "disposed of" by it. It was upon that very theory, which I never regarded as too sound, that Congress appropriated money for the volcano sufferers in Martinique, for the earthquake sufferers in San Francisco, and for the fire sufferers in Boston or Chicago—I have forgotten which.

Suppose the absurdity that the Federal Government agreed to submit to arbitration the question of debts due by a State and contracted by a State, and not due by nor contracted by itself (and universally recognized not to be), how would the State be hurt? If the United States wanted, for any reason satisfactory to itself, to pay any bondholders the amount of a disputed bond of North Carolina, for example, let them do it. North Carolina, holding the debt fraudulent, neither ought to nor would repay the amount. The procedure of the United States Government would be harmless to North Carolina, even though it were sentimentally offensive.

I want the Senator from Georgia, when struggling later with this ghost, to direct his attention to that point. The United States would have no way known under high heaven to recover, and the United States Government would have no right to pay them except as a gratuity, just as it gave $20,000,000 to Spain, just as it gave a million, or whatever it was, to the Martinique sufferers; and that is an admission, for the sake of argument on my part, because I for one have always doubted whether that clause of the Constitution saying that Congress had power "to dispose of the property of the United States" applied to money in the Treasury, when it disposed of it for some purpose not otherwise specifically or inferentially contemplated by the Constitution. But the theory has been acted upon, and therefore I waive dispute of it in this case.

In the case of the United States freely and unnecessarily agreeing to pay a sum equal to the debt of a State, no power to hold the State would reside in the Federal Government. All the lawyers in the world could not conceive of any method whereby the Federal Government could make the State pay the money back to it, unless the State had requested or agreed to the arbitration or had requested or agreed to the payment by the United States and in that way had made itself morally, if not legally, liable. I mean by that in no peaceable way. Of course, if the United States chose to collect it by armed force, I imagine it could. But that is out of the question.

It seemed to me almost unnecessary to argue this question, and yet this anxiety is being worked in many of the States with a view to creating hostility to universal peace arbitration treaties.

It seems equally plain that the question of the admission of aliens is, as it always has been considered, one of purely domestic policy, except in so far as treaty agreements exist. So long as treaty agreements exist we can be called upon to arbitrate things arising under them or the differences of interpretation growing out of them, and we ought to be required to do it.

If we of our own free will enter into a treaty obligation with any country on the surface of the earth, we ought to be willing to leave to arbitration the question whether or not we are observing that treaty. But except when there is such a treaty obligation, nobody has ever been bold enough to urge that any country did not have entire plenary control over the question of the admission of aliens to its own shores, and even when there is a treaty, the right to abrogate the treaty is always reserved in the treaty itself, and even if it were neglected to be reserved, the right to abrogate exists as a conceded fact in international law. So that upon proper notice the treaty could be abrogated if, in our opinion, the interpretation had made its operation injurious to us, and the utmost burden we would undergo would be for the short time during which the notice of abrogation was operating.

We to-day exclude Chinese without a treaty. We limit the immigration of Japanese with a treaty. We could to-morrow, if we chose, pass a law declaring that red-headed aliens should not land upon American soil for the purpose of residence. We could forget our very ancestry, if we chose, and provide that Irishmen should not come or that Scotchmen or Englishmen should not. It might hurt the feelings of the people of Ireland, or Scotland, or England, or the feelings of red-headed men all over the world; but we would be acting, unless we had voluntarily entered into treaty obligations to the contrary, within an undoubted and admitted scope of domestic policy, which could not constitute a rightful casus belli.

But the great objection made to the treaty is that there is a surrender of the prerogatives of the Senate.

Mr. President, I have not been here long enough to regard the Senate as especially sacred, except in the sense that all other American institutions are. It seems that the august body of which I am a humble member—some of the Senators talk that way—wants to make itself still more hated and distrusted than it is by standing with fine-spun, if not fancied, prerogatives athwart the way of another great and greatly desired progressive movement. I hope that the language that I have italicized in the first part of the treaty shows that the treaty itself expressly and specifically guards against this objection by the words in the next to the last clause of article 1, providing that the "special agreement" "in each case" shall be made "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." Even when the joint high commission itself "reports" that a question is "justiciable," that does not of itself fix the character of the board of arbitration nor the scope of its inquiry, for the provision of the language is that such a question shall then "be referred to arbitration in accordance with the provisions of this treaty"; and in order to so refer it "in accordance with the provisions of this treaty" a "special agreement" "in each case" must, by the express requirement of the treaty itself, be made, and that special agreement must be made "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." The Senate merely by failing to act could block the whole procedure. But even if such a joint high commission, with members appointed by the President "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate"—for all Federal appointments must be so made—could not only directly refer a question to arbitration as a result of its having decided that it was "justiciable" in its nature, but could define the scope of the arbitrators—which it can not—I contend that that would be no surrender of the prerogatives of the Senate, even though there might be danger to national policies, which I think I have shown to be practically imaginary. It is a maxim of law that "that is certain which can be made certain." If an arbitration treaty were entered into such as is supposed—and nobody disputes that the treaty itself must be adopted by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, two-thirds of its Members voting for it—and if that treaty provided that all "justiciable" questions should be arbitrable, and defined, as this treaty does, what questions are justiciable, and further said that in case of dispute the commission should determine the point of justiciableness or disputed interpretation, then the creation and action of the commission itself would be "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," the only difference being that the advice and consent by a two-thirds majority of the Senate was given beforehand and not afterwards and was given in wholesale and not by retail.

It has never been disputed that the Senate can pass a treaty, submitting to a particular board of arbitration a particular question, and that the Government of the United States could be morally bound beforehand by the award. If it be not inimical to the constitutional prerogatives of the Senate to agree beforehand to submit a particular question to a specially selected arbitral tribunal, then how can it be inimical to those same prerogatives to agree beforehand to submit all "justiciable" and "international questions" "hereafter arising" to a permanent tribunal "or one otherwise" to be determined "by special agreement"? According to my poor, weak intellect, the principle in the two cases is the same. Of course, under a general arbitration treaty as under a special arbitration, if the award of the arbitration is that the United States Government shall pay money, this Government is powerless to pay it unless "Congress" shall appropriate it. But this defect is common to both schemes—special and general arbitration. Unless that part of the Constitution of the United States which says that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law" is changed, this will be always the case in all cases, whether particular or general, national or international.

I myself have always thought that that clause of the Constitution ought to be modified to fit cases of treaty agreements to pay. However, it has never yet in our history given any serious trouble, because when a payment of money under a treaty is so popular that the President and two-thirds of the Senate have agreed to it it has never happened, and perhaps never will happen, that there will not be for the same purpose and at the same time and for the same reasons a majority of the House of Representatives advocating it. Still, if at some time a clash of this sort should occur, after a solemn agreement by treaty to pay and a refusal by Congress to appropriate, it would leave us in a very awkward condition. I have always thought that it was one of the situations overlooked by our forefathers. To illustrate, when a Member of the House I was bitterly opposed to our annexation of the Philippines. Part of the agreement of the annexation was the payment of $20,000,000 to Spain. The question came to the House for an appropriation of the money. I took the position, as did many others, that while the treaty was an unwise one and while there was no legal obligation upon our part to appropriate, the President and the Senate having no power to bind the House of Representatives, there was a moral obligation tantamount in force in my opinion to a legal one or even superior to it, just in the same sense that debts of honor are superior to commercial debts, and that a gentleman will be more solicitous about providing for the payment of an unsecured debt where no legal recovery can be had than he would be about a secured one, for whose collection and payment the law makes provision.

Mr. President, the Senate does not here delegate a power to make a treaty. It exercises the power by appointing an agent to represent it within certain limits.

Postal agreements with other nations were referred to the other day by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. He was singularly unfortunate in his reference, because he denied that they were treaties, and he said we could fix international postal rates by statutory law in the United States. We could do no such thing, nor fix anything else to operate outside of our own domain. We have upon the contrary appointed an instrumentality for the purpose of doing that, and that is the Postmaster General with the concurrence of the President.

The Senator tried to make a distinction between a convention and a treaty. They are both agreements with some other foreign and independent power. There can be no convention between two independent sovereign nations on the face of this earth which is not in the nature of a treaty. It is absurd to say that any international postal arrangement or agreement could owe its existence simply to an American law. It is true that the American law takes care of the matter so far as the American receipt of postal dues is concerned and so far as the operation of the posts on American soil goes, but all our postal conventions have been treaties, and they have been treaties which have been negotiated in this way. In every case the Senate of the United States did not delegate the treaty-making power to the President and the Postmaster General. Congress merely passed a general law in which they said that under certain circumstances and within certain limits the Postmaster General and the President would constitute the agency for the purpose of making these agreements. It was not a delegation of the power, but an exercise of the power through an instrumentality selected by the treaty-making power.

I go on a little further. Under the Geneva arbitration treaty, the arbitration of the Alabama claims, not only did the commission decide the amount of damage that was done and the liability of Great Britain for that damage, but that commission decided upon the question of its own jurisdiction, the scope of its inquiry under the treaty. The two Governments entered into a treaty in certain general terms, and the question came up before the commission as to how far it could go under that treaty, and the commission itself interpreted the treaty, just as this joint high commission is called upon to interpret this treaty.

If the Government of the United States could leave to a commission not only the power to arbitrate but the power to interpret the treaty law under which it arbitrated, why can it not leave to one commission the power to arbitrate and give another commission the power to interpret?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President—

Mr. WILLIAMS. In one minute. That commission met, and one of the first questions that came up—and it was a great dispute between the British commissioners and the American commissioners—was as to how far the treaty went, and the commission itself decided the question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The case cited by the Senator from Mississippi was a specific grant. This is a general power.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I know no difference between the two, specific and general, except a difference in degree. Here this is specific, but in a broader sense it is the arbitration of justiciableness of questions. That commission arbitrated a certain class of questions defined under the treaty to be settled as having grown out of the conduct of Great Britain toward the United States in the war between the States. That commission had to decide as to whether certain acts urged or sought to be urged were to be taken as being within the scope of the treaty. All this joint high commission does is to determine whether certain questions ought to be considered as being within the scope of Article I of the treaty.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yet they must go to arbitration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; and after the President decides or admits that a question is justiciable we are also morally bound under this treaty to go to arbitration. It is then just as high a moral obligation as there is when the commission after dispute decides that same question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But, Mr. President, we have no alternative at all if we ratify Article III. We must proceed, no matter how distasteful the duty.

Mr. WILLIAMS. We have no alternative in a case where the President admits that the question is justiciable, except such alternative as we also have when a commission decides that a question is justiciable. That is all that this commission does under the sun. The Senator may study this treaty until both he and I are more gray-headed than we are now—and we are both more gray-headed now than we were when we first met—he may study it a long time, and he can find but one thing to say, and that is that when the commission decides in a case of dispute as to justiciableness that the question is justiciable it puts things right back where they would have been if the question of justiciableness had never been raised.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, for these reasons, if the President of the United States raises that question, we will never have any duty to perform; but if the question is raised, as it may be, by Great Britain, we have nothing to do but to submit to arbitration the questions at issue.

I should like to ask the Senator from Mississippi whether he believes that under this treaty Great Britain will ever ask the United States to submit to arbitration any question that the Senate of the United States would not have consented to arbitrate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; the Senator does not know; but we have superimposed upon ourselves a tribunal which may force the Senate and the Government against its will into arbitration which we have no power whatever to deny, no matter how vital it may be to our national life.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, there is always a distinction between a right and a power, even a moral right and a power, between a right and a duty even, as far as that is concerned. The point I was making was that after a commission decides that a question of disputed justiciableness is justiciable it merely puts the things back in the status quo ante—that is to say, where things would have been if the President had first decided that it was justiciable. Now, I want to read the language of the treaty.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is clause 3.

Mr. CULBERSON. On page 48.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This language is just as sacred as the language which follows in clause 3, saying that then the question shall be referred to arbitration in accordance with the provisions of this treaty. This language is just as sacred as the other. It is in clause 1:

All differences hereafter arising between the High Contracting Parties, which it has not been possible to adjust by diplomacy, relating to international matters in which the high contracting parties are concerned by virtue of a claim of right made by one against the other under treaty or otherwise, and which are justiciable in their nature by reason of being susceptible of decision by the application of the principles of law or equity, shall be submitted—to the permanent court of arbitration established at The Hague by the convention of October 18, 1907, or to some other arbitral tribunal, as shall be decided in each case by special agreement, which special agreement shall provide for the organization of such tribunal if necessary, to define the scope of the powers of the arbitrators, the question or questions at issue, and settle the terms of reference and the procedure thereunder.

Shall be submitted—

In so far as mere language can make anything a sacred obligation that makes a sacred obligation, whenever the President of the United States does not dispute the justiciableness of a question, we are bound under the treaty to arbitrate it; and in so far it binds the Senate, and it binds it no further. After that dispute has arisen and the question as to whether or not the question falls within the scope of Article I and is justiciable has been submitted to the commission, and the commission has decided that it is justiciable, then exactly the same obligation rests upon the Senate, no more and no less.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President—

Mr. WILLIAMS. In my opinion the obligation rests in both cases.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator—

Mr. WILLIAMS. Wait one minute. It ought never to be violated except in obedience to one other law, and that is that law which has been called the first law of nature—self-preservation—the same law which entitles a man under municipal jurisprudence to kill his fellow citizen. Now I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator answered my proposed inquiry whether, after the difference was determined by the joint high commission, we were not bound to proceed to arbitration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. We would be morally bound, in my opinion, at every hazard and at every price, except self-destruction.

Mr. President, does Congress surrender the power to legislate when it provides that the President, by proclamation, may apply one of two schedules of tariff rates to imports from a foreign country, either a maximum or a minimum scale on the arriving of a certain contingency?

Moreover, mark you, when it leaves to the President to judge of the arriving of the contingency. Congress passes a general law. It says here are two scales of duty—one maximum, the other minimum—and then it says upon the arriving of a certain contingency defined in the law the President shall put into operation whichever of these two tariff rates he thinks—the contingency having in his opinion arisen—is justified by the law. Will you contend that Congress has surrendered the power to fix tariff rates when it does that? All that Congress has done has been to constitute an agency to act for it within certain prescribed limitations.

Now, let us go a little further. In that case the President is left to interpret the law, and here the joint high commission is left to interpret the scope of the law. Does Congress surrender that power of legislation when it leaves certain customs authorities to interpret a tariff law, and in interpreting it to determine whether a given duty or another or none at all applies to a certain imported article? Does Congress surrender the power to regulate railway rates in interstate commerce when, after first declaring that rates shall be "reasonable, just, and nondiscriminatory," it leaves an Interstate Commerce Commission to fix them so that they shall fall within the law, and to interpret the law and its scope in a given case by saying that a given disputed rate is within or without the scope of a certain clause or article of the law? And yet all this joint high commission determines is whether a given question falls within or without the scope of Article I of the treaty if adopted. This joint high commission, then, is to determine whether any question falls within the treaty. In the other case the Interstate Commerce Commission is to interpret what are "reasonable, just, and nondiscriminatory" rates and to declare and prescribe them.

Going a step further, this joint commission, after having decided that the thing is justiciable, does not sit in arbitration, and the Interstate Commerce Commission, after deciding that certain rates are just or reasonable or nondiscriminatory, then does sit in arbitration and fixes a rate which it has a right to pronounce to be just and reasonable and nondiscriminatory.

Now, gentlemen may respond, it is true, that there is an appeal from the Interstate Commerce Commission to a higher tribunal, and that in this case there is none. As to myself I hope that I may live to see the day when there shall be an international tribunal on the surface of this earth to whom appeals shall be taken. So far from wanting interested arbiters, I hope some day to see an international court of arbitration between the nations which shall be disinterested.

Gentlemen tell me that they are not willing to stand for anything which does not leave them to judge as to what shall be done—that shall not leave us to be the judge in our own case. But an international disinterested court is not in the treaty here, and I am not compelled to make that argument now. I just "throw it in sideways," as Bill Arp used to say.

Now, remember, neither the Customs Commission nor the Interstate Commerce Commission has to come back to the Congress, and remember that the Postmaster General and the President do not have to come back to the Senate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In one moment. In all these cases, as in this treaty case, the special agents were acting under a general authority of law or treaty granted in advance and by wholesale. Now I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator contend that when the Interstate Commerce Commission fixes a railroad rate it is engaged in any act of legislation?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; on the other hand, I am contending exactly the contrary.

Mr. REED. It simply decides a question of fact.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It simply decides a question of fact which it was appointed an agent to decide. It simply decides whether a rate is "reasonable, just, and nondiscriminatory" or the contrary; just as this commission will decide a question of fact, to wit, whether the particular question is a justiciable one or not.

Mr. REED. I want to get the Senator's view as to whether he thinks there is really any parallel between the Congress empowering a board—the Interstate Commerce Commission—to decide a question of fact as to what is a reasonable railroad rate, the power existing in Congress to regulate the rate, and submitting to a board the question as to whether a certain matter is justiciable, and then following that by a further provision that when it has been determined as a fact to be justiciable, the question of the right of the matter shall be determined by another board. Does the Senator really think the two instances are parallel?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I would be guilty of the very grossest lack of intellectual integrity if I had been arguing for a quarter of an hour the analogy and did not believe it. Now, in the one case you leave to an Interstate Commerce Commission to determine what? Whether a given rate is "reasonable" or not. The question of reasonableness—a rather indefinite question—requires that the board shall determine very many things. In the other case, you leave to this other board or commission the determination of the "justiciableness" of a question. One is no more indefinite than the other; and in each case you leave what? Now, a treaty is a law, and therefore we must call them both laws. You leave the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine whether a given rate falls within the scope of the prohibition of the law or not, and you leave to this commission the power to determine as to whether a given question falls outside of the scope of this treaty or not.

The analogy is not only in my mind good, but it is absolutely complete. There is only one point of difference, and that arises subsequently to the transaction. It is that the opinion of the Interstate Commerce Commission may be reviewed in another court, and the opinion of this arbitral board can not, because there is no international supreme court.

Mr. REED. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield further to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. REED. I have such a profound regard for the opinion of the Senator from Mississippi that I want to say I am not arguing these questions in an antagonistic way, but to elicit his opinion. I wanted to follow my question with this further one: When the Congress of the United States by law creates the Interstate Commerce Board and submits to it certain propositions it submits to a board of its own creation those particular propositions. Does not the Senator see any difference between a board of that kind, created entirely by an act of Congress, and a board not more than one half of which we can name, the other half to be named by our antagonist? Is there not a distinction there, and a very broad one?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the question of what constitutes a board is one thing and the question of the source of the creation of the board is another. The Senator from Missouri says that in the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission the board is created by our act. Yes; and this joint high commission is created by our act if we pass this treaty. The fact as to who can serve upon the commission does not affect that question. It is true that this commission is created not only by our act but by the act of another power cooperating with us, but in so far as it is created to affect us at all it is created solely by our act. Our act is a sine qua non of the creation of this commission.

Mr. REED. Not more than the other.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And it is just as much our own free-will act as the creation of a domestic commission for other purposes is.

Now, what is the general authority here in this treaty? It is the scope of Article I. What is that? "Difference between the contracting parties." I recommend that phrase to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Bacon]. It is not a difference between the State of North Carolina and somebody; it is not a difference between the Steel Trust and somebody; it is not a difference between the Senator from Mississippi and somebody; but it is "a difference between the contracting parties." It is also "international," "justiciable," and "hereafter arising."

Here are two powers of the Senate equally constitutional, one to arbitrate by special and separate act a certain difference after it has arisen, and another to bunch differences hereafter to arise and to agree to arbitrate them before they arise, defining their character under a general authority, and further agreeing to arbitrate by a prescribed tribunal a difference of opinion as to whether any particular question to arise is or is not of the character defined. That is all there is to it.

Now, which course is most for our national or for the world's welfare, to wait until we are quarreling with somebody and then try to agree upon a just method of settling the difference, or to agree beforehand in a prescribed way to settle all justiciable differences? The whole history of municipal progress answers the question. Men no longer wait until they quarrel but agree upon and by law prescribe a board to settle their differences. They constitute beforehand courts which shall settle them. It is no longer contended in municipal matters that either party ought to be a part of the court; and the time will come, thank God, some day in the future, when that will not be contended in international matters. The time has not come yet, as is proven by the arguments on this treaty, where the gravamen of objection is that we want to be always the final judge in our own case; and it is not competent or relevant to argue it now, because this treaty contemplates the old idea of each fellow having his foot on the trestle. When a man tells me he is willing to arbitrate and then goes on and refines and defines until he substantially says, "I am willing to arbitrate anything in the world in such a way that it will not be settled against me," then the man is not willing to arbitrate at all. If that is all, let us just quit the whole foolishness.

Mr. President, if nations sought as industriously for fine-spun reasons to be at peace with one another as they do for fine-spun pretexts of difference, and if they stood on as fine points of so-called honor concerning their duties toward one another as they do concerning their rights, the world would be better off.

The objection has been actually made to this treaty to-day that the United States would be surrendering some of its sovereignty, and Congress would be "surrendering the constitutional right to declare war"; yet the same Constitution which gives Congress power to declare war gives the President and two-thirds of the Senate the power to prevent war and the occasion or the necessity for war by entering into treaties. There never was a treaty entered into by the United States Government, nor by any other government for that matter, that did not waive for the nonce and, to the extent of the concession made, surrender the exercise of some sovereign power. Just as when you and I make an agreement, a compromise, I surrender some right in my opinion and you surrender some in yours and to that extent curtail an otherwise discretionary sovereignty.

Now, here are two powers equally constitutional, but the power vested in the President and the Senate to prevent war is a very much more sacred and holy thing than the power vested in Congress to declare war; but as a matter of mere power and as a mere matter of fact and law, the fact that the President and two-thirds of the Senate have entered into a treaty does not and can not deprive Congress of this precious power to shed human blood if Congress wants to have it shed. It does deprive Congress of the right to do it under the moral law and under the law of decency amongst nations which we call international law.

Mr. President, we need not be too careful about guarding the right of Congress or the power of Congress to declare war. There will be wars enough—useless, barbarous, silly, demoralizing in their effects, as they always are and always have been; destructive of industry, destructive of family happiness; teaching bloodthirstiness, teaching rapine, sometimes teaching rape; nearly always teaching looting, which is but a form of militaristic grand or petit larceny; carrying mankind always some steps backward out of enlightenment and toward barbarity. We will have enough of war and pretexts for war, no matter how many treaties we have to keep the peace. This is true especially, I am sorry to say, in a popular government, because when a majority of the people "get mad through and through" they do not act from ratiocination, but from emotion, and they push and propel, by the mad and irresistible power of public opinion, their servants, too often craven and cowardly, into a course which more cool-headed and braver and better-informed men would avoid.

This constitutes the very beauty of the establishment of the joint high commission of inquiry under this treaty. Even an intelligent people under a popular government will now and then have a "brain storm" and will "see things red," especially when egged on by yellow journals seeking sensations, by political parties seeking mutually advantage, and by parties professionally interested in promotion by war or industrially interested in producing the materials of war. Hastily spoken words in high places and hastily printed utterances in one country engender like utterances in the other country. It is as if each were holding a coal of fire in his hands and the other blowing it. But a popular brain storm will not, as a rule, last 12 months, and the cooler heads in legislative and executive and financial and industrial positions, whose duty it is to stand like "sentinels on the watchtower to warn and to instruct," can within the course of 12 months make effective appeal to reason against hot passion. The popular reason is always there if time is given to appeal to it. This treaty gives, by previous agreement therein prescribed, 12 months to appeal to popular reason against popular passion.

For one, I do not desire to see this treaty emasculated by amendments. I do not mean by that that I would not vote for any amendment if it strengthened it, or if it did not weaken it, or if it did not endanger its final adoption, or if it rendered the hopes of peace under it no less great, and if it rendered the chance of war no less imminent. It seems to me it would do no harm, although it would be unnecessary, to imitate the example of Great Britain in making her reservation as to her self-governing colonies, which, however self-governing, are not sovereign in any aspect as our States are in so many aspects.

It might be done by language somewhat to this effect: "It is understood by both high contracting parties that the Federal Government of the United States has not the power nor the right under American institutions to submit to arbitration any question over which jurisdiction has not been vested in it by the United States Constitution." It would do no harm and it might do good in securing in the Senate the votes needful for the passage of the treaty, for there are honest men in the Senate and out of it who fear that under the guise of international agreement the inherent, admitted, and constitutional rights of the States may be invaded by the Federal President and Senate. I do not share that fear. I see no absolute need for the amendment, even if the fear were well grounded, because if the Federal judiciary did its duty it would pronounce a treaty of that sort "unconstitutional, null, and void," because it had not been made "in pursuance of the Constitution," just as it would pronounce any other law not made "in pursuance of the Constitution" null and void.

I have no objection to this much of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts; in fact, I think it would be well to adopt it:

Resolved further, That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty, with the understanding, to be made a part of such ratification, that in any joint high commission of inquiry to which shall be referred the question as to whether or not a difference is subject to arbitration under Article I of the treaty, as provided by Article III thereof, the American members of such commission shall be appointed by the President, subject to the advice and consent of the Senate.

Already the President and the Senate have that power under this treaty. They, or either of them, can always call either for a commission of that sort, instead of the court of The Hague; but, for fear some President at some time might be a traitor to American institutions, I should like to see that much of the Lodge amendment adopted. I am going to ask at the proper time whether or not the amendment is divisible, so that I may vote upon one part of it without voting for the other.

I see nothing in the remainder of the amendment that really changes the character of the treaty, but it seems to me to be unnecessary verbiage and to incur the general danger of language too general. If, however, I can not get the question divided, I will vote for the whole amendment rather than vote against it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Mississippi recalls that the committee have an amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the one I am talking about now.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I mean an amendment which affects the treaty. This is the resolution of ratification which shows our construction of the treaty, but the committee have proposed an amendment striking out paragraph 3 of Article III entirely.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am opposed to that. I think if we strike out clause 3 of Article III we shall strike out the chiefly good thing about the treaty, the opportunity for cooling time. If you strike that out you have struck out everything that gives a chance for reason to get the better of passion.

Mr. President, I shall not argue some other insidious objections to this treaty. They are objections which are made in secret rather than in public; they are sent around in anonymous communications to Senators and vouched for by nobody in particular; they are based largely upon ulterior motives entertained by some few of our foreign-born citizens in the United States—not by a majority of them nor by a majority of either race of them, but by a very active and somewhat influential minority of some of them. Here is one that has come by mail with the heading: "Would lead the Republic back to England." The reasons that are given privately and for ulterior motives contain all the slush and stuff and rot and rubbish and silliness and stupidity that has been uttered about this treaty being "a treaty of alliance with Great Britain," and all that sort of thing. I shall not read this thing. It charges that the President of the United States and Andrew Carnegie have entered into an unholy alliance for the purpose of "monarchizing" American institutions and leading us back to allegiance to the British King, King George, the whichever he is numerally—I have forgotten.

There are some people who wish to use the United States Government in perpetuating European feuds for the real freedom or for the fancied benefit of European populations, and who want to see as possible instruments of that purpose as many causes of war between the United States and Great Britain left in existence as possible. Impliedly, if not expressly, in the act of naturalization, such citizens promised not to be controlled by precisely the motives by which they are now being controlled. They are acting in bad faith toward America if they do not regard their American citizenship as their first and foremost and sole allegiance—all others having been foresworn—and as superior to all other obligations existing between them and anybody anywhere else. At any rate, no self-respecting American citizen is going to permit the American Government to be used as a cat's-paw for pulling out chestnuts for other peoples, however much any wrongs done them may excite our individual sympathies.

I say that, although I go very far in the direction of community independence. I go so far that I believe any community that wants to be independent of any other existing, geographically, so that boundary delimitations can be drawn, and with comparatively unanimous solidarity of sentiment, ought to be permitted to be independent. I think the greatest achievement of these later times was the peaceable secession of Norway from Sweden, and the magnificent common sense with which the people of Sweden said: "If you think you can be happier in a separate household, go!" So I have more sympathy than most men with communities struggling against the overpowering national strength of other races and other people; but that is one question, and the question of using my Government for those purposes is another.

Then, again, without arguing it, I will mention another very curious objection to the treaty which was made to me by an educated and cultured, but very zealous and patriotic, "German-American," so called. By the way, Mr. President, I never understood "hyphenated Americanism." I know what a German is and I know what an American is, and I know what an American of German birth or parentage is, but I do not know what a German-American is, and if the hyphen means a double allegiance, then I do not comprehend it, save to fear it or to hate it. I am glad to say that most Americans of German birth or parentage agree with me, even if they are hyphenated, and when they are hyphenated they resent the idea of a double allegiance. But to go on. This German-American said that he regarded this treaty between America and Great Britain as a "blow at Germany." He said that it "was intended to put the Kaiser in the attitude of appearing to be the sole opponent of world's peace," intended to "hold him up in that way to obloquy and scorn." I am very fond of the German people, having lived amongst them and learned to love them during a part of my educational period. I learned to love all kinds of German things and all parts of Germany. I replied, "Why, my dear sir, there is nothing in that, because the United States Government will offer precisely the same treaty in precisely the same words to the Emperor of Germany, and will not even wait for him to indicate a willingness to consider it, but will ask him, through the proper diplomatic channels, whether he is willing to consider it. It will meet him not halfway, but all the way; and, indeed, probably has already sounded him upon the subject."

I have found out since that this probability became an actuality, and that our Government is, I believe, ready to execute the treaty. Then I added, "If he is to be held up to 'obloquy and scorn' as an obstacle in the pathway of universal peace; an obstacle in the pathway of the earlier coming of the hoped-for 'parliament of man and the federation of the world'; as an obstacle to the final establishment of an amphyctionic council of the civilized world, he is the only person in the world who can so hold himself up."

Mr. President, nobody believes, as the Senator from Massachusetts intimated the other day, that we were silly enough to imagine that these treaties will secure universal peace; but war amongst civilized nations ought to be reduced to a minimum, ought, in fact, to be totally abolished, and will finally, in my hope and faith and belief, be nearly abolished, just as civilized individuals have long since learned not to take the law into their own hands, but to submit their differences to tribunals prescribed beforehand, though now and then some of us do fight. We do not as individuals or nations surrender our rights; we merely constitute tribunals to prescribe and determine them. So it ought to be with the nations of the world. Nations ought to learn not to be judges in their own cases, not to take the law into their own hands, but to establish some permanent, disinterested tribunal for the arbitration of questions arising amongst civilized peoples. This treaty does not even do that, but its greatest virtue, in my opinion, is that it is a step in the right direction. Of course, there will be barbaric and semibarbaric powers with whom it would be folly to enter into such agreements; recognizing in themselves no law but force, there would be no way of dealing with them except by force, but the white races of the world at any rate and some others have become sufficiently refined to have a horror of international "trial by battle." All are growing weary, Mr. President, of supporting out of the hard earnings of the workers the expenses of the fighters, and all are beginning to foresee national bankruptcies as the result of the stupendous competition of the peoples to "secure peace by being always prepared for war."

Soon after I went back home from the University of Virginia I met a fellow who had killed about five men and who always went armed. I said to him one night, "Jim, why do you not put that pistol up?" "Well," he said, "John, I carry this pistol all the time so as to keep the peace. Nothing keeps a fellow out of so many rows as everybody knowing that he has got a pistol in his hip pocket." It did not keep him out of them, for finally he was shot. Those who live by the pistol die by it.

Who, of all the nations and people, if not we, can or will take the initiative? Do not our traditions, our ideals, our intense democracy—which is only a phrase designating the principle of the brotherhood of man—our educational and industrial activities demanding peace and progress, ever one and inseparable, our overwhelming and acknowledged strength preventing all misunderstanding of our motives, and our almost impregnable geographical position, do not all these, trumpet tongued, designate us as chosen of God for this task?

Lord of the centuries, pardon the ages
Dark with the terror of battle and blood!
Give forth Thy light and unfold the bright pages—
Glorious era of true brotherhood.

A great Federal general once said that "war is hell." I have frequently felt that he ought not to have given himself quite so much trouble to make it more unadulterated hell than it needed to have been, but still he was right. War is hell. Another great Federal general said, "Let us have peace"; and I say, Mr. President, let us have peace and let us not be too finically nice about how we secure it, even though by wholesale and in advance or at the time the quarrel arises.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Mississippi a question before he takes his seat. I understood the Senator some little time ago—I did not want to interrupt him then—when he was comparing the joint high commission of inquiry with the Interstate Commerce Commission to say that there was an appeal from the Interstate Commerce Commission to the Supreme Court.

Mr. WILLIAMS. An appeal to another court, I ought to have said.

Mr. LODGE. An appeal to another court, a higher court, but that there was no appeal from the high commission of inquiry, and that that was where they differed. Did I understand the Senator correctly?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I said that there was no appeal from the arbitral commission. I admitted that the moral obligation to arbitrate followed the decision, but that from the decision of the arbitral commission itself there was no appeal. In international affairs each nation is, unfortunately, still its own court of appeals.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator speak now of the arbitral tribunal or of the high commission of inquiry?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of the arbitral tribunal.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, the final arbitral tribunal, of course. I understood the Senator to be comparing the joint high commission of inquiry with the Interstate Commerce Commission in deciding the point of the arbitrability or justiciability of the question, because that, of course—

Mr. WILLIAMS. I see what the Senator means now. I will admit, for the sake of the argument, that its decision is morally binding.

Mr. LODGE. That the decision of the joint high commission on the arbitrability of a question is morally binding?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. That is my view.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I ask whether it is the desire of the Senator from Massachusetts that we should go on this afternoon? It is now practically half past 4 o'clock, and we have been here since 12 o'clock continuously, or at least some of us, if not all. I am ready to conform to whatever the desire of the Senator may be.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from Georgia prefers not to go on now, I will move a recess.

Mr. BACON. I have but one objection to going on now, Mr. President, and that is that the Senate is evidently weary, and it is quite thin. I will state, in justification of many of the absentees, that I know there are some important committees in session, and Senators have been absent during the afternoon largely on that account; but if it is entirely consistent with the Senator's views I should be very glad if the Senate would take a recess until some time to-morrow, and then I will begin.

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate take a recess until half past 1 o'clock to-morrow afternoon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate, as in open executive session, took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 6, 1912, at 1.30, p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 5, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, open Thou our understanding and mellow our hearts that we may know each other better and be ready to sympathize with each other's failings, that the Christ spirit may dwell in us and love become the ruling passion of men; that the strong may help the weak, the wise the foolish, the rich the poor, the good the bad; that peace and good will may cover the earth as the waters cover the sea. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE SUGAR SCHEDULE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee on Ways and Means, by direction of that committee, reported the bill (H. R. 21213) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909 (H. Rept. 391), which was read a first and second time, ordered printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

INCOME-TAX DECISION.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed as a House document the report of the case of Flint v. Stone Tracy Co., in the Supreme Court of the United States, reported in the Two hundred and twentieth United States Reports, at page 107, and that 5,000 copies of the document be printed (H. Doc. No. 601).

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the corporation-tax case be printed as a public document, and that 5,000 copies be printed. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, will not the gentleman include in that request the printing of the two opinions of the Supreme Court in Pollock v. Farmers' Trust & Loan Co. on the income tax of the Wilson bill, and have all three printed together?

Mr. PALMER. The report of the Pollock case has been printed as a document, if not by the House by the Senate. I do not think it would be wise to put them all in the same pamphlet.

Mr. MANN. The opinions are not available now as a document. I think it would be wise to have them in one pamphlet. They relate to the same subject matter.

Mr. PALMER. Hardly to the same subject matter. I admit that both are important in connection with present legislation. The gentleman means the opinions upon the original hearing and upon the rehearing?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. PALMER. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will modify my request and include in it the complete opinions in the income-tax cases in the One hundred and fifty-seventh and One hundred and fifty-eighth United States Report upon the original hearing and upon the rehearing, both the opinions of the court and of the minority by the several justices who dissented.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania modifies his request so as to include all the opinions of the court in the original hearing and upon the rehearing, both the majority and the dissenting opinion. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, the Washington Post of this morning contained an article which I send to the Clerk's desk to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WILL DEFEND FLORIDA—GOV. GILCHRIST HERE TO ANSWER EVERGLADES CHARGES—DECLARES MATTER IS A PLOT—ASSERTS THAT RAILROADS OF THE WEST ARE BEHIND ALLEGATIONS THAT THE HOUSE COMMITTEE IS INVESTIGATING—WILL REPLY TO REPRESENTATIVE CLARK—SAYS HIS STATE IS AROUSED.

Gov. A. W. Gilchrist, of Florida, arrived in Washington yesterday and lost no time in making known his desire to be heard by the Committee on Expenditures in the Agricultural Department in the matter of the charges made against the proposition to reclaim the Everglades of his State. He says the people of Florida are aroused by charges made by Representative FRANK CLARK that the reclamation of 4,000,000 acres of swamp land is only a scheme to further the interests of a coterie of land corporations.

"I came to Washington," Gov. Gilchrist said, "to let the committee know the true state of affairs."

PUTS BLAME ON RAILROAD.

"In my opinion the attacks are instigated by the railroads of the West, who wish to have this great immigration to Florida stopped. They are naturally anxious to not only keep their own people at home, but to have other immigrants come to their country. Naturally with the influx into our country the western railroad interests are being diminished."

"The last census shows that Florida's increase in population was 42.1 per cent, second to no State east of the Mississippi. The value of the Everglades and the feasibility of the drainage and the healthfulness of the country have been admitted by all who have visited the section."

QUOTES REPRESENTATIVE CLARK.

"I am at a loss to understand or account for the attacks made upon the Everglades by Representative CLARK. From what I have been told, he has never seen them. When the congressional committee, on its way to Washington from Key West, stopped off at Fort Lauderdale to visit the Everglades, it is said that Representative CLARK's boat reached the cypress swamp that borders part of the eastern edge of the Everglades, when Mr. CLARK, addressing the committee, said:

"Gentlemen, here are the Everglades. You see what they are. This is all there is to see. Let us go back, as I have an engagement with Mr. Flagler at Palm Beach." And toward Palm Beach his boat was turned immediately. From the citizens of Fort Lauderdale I have the information that Representative CLARK never did reach the Everglades. "I am confident that the investigation in progress will prove his charges to be unfounded. Just what his motive was in bringing them I know not, but I can say they are a mistake."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much to be compelled to ask a little of the time of this House to say something upon this most remarkable emanation. The Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture of this House is engaged in making certain investigations. They are examining witnesses in an honest endeavor to ascertain the facts. I have been content to wait until the facts have been submitted to that honorable committee, and until that committee had made its report to this House so that the House might be in possession of all the facts and could take such action as could properly come within its jurisdiction and was right.

But the governor of my State fearing, I suppose, that the two Senators from Florida and the three Representatives in this House were incapable of taking care of the interests of the State has seen fit to journey all the way from Tallahassee to Washington, as he says, to "defend Florida." Now, Mr. Speaker, if I were really making an attack on my State or any of the interests of my State, surely the two gentlemen who sit at the other end of the Capitol and my two distinguished colleagues on this floor would take care of the interests of that State without the interposition of the governor. But the governor comes, and forthwith, without waiting to appear before the committee and under oath give testimony, proceeds to get into communication with a newspaper reporter and issues this remarkable manifesto.

Mr. Speaker, let me say, in the first place, that people may wonder what motive is actuating me and why I began or undertook to put on foot this investigation. I will tell you. In October last year there appeared an article in the Washington Times in which it was stated, in substance, that a certain valuable official document of the Department of Agriculture had been suppressed, that document being a document dealing with the Everglades of Florida; that in some mysterious manner the report of the engineers who had made a survey of the Everglades had disappeared, and the circular letter which had been prepared to give information to inquirers all over the country had suddenly been suppressed.

The article went on to say that it had been learned that this circular letter was suppressed at the instance of former Senator Taliaferro of Florida, and myself, and that we had gone to the Department of Agriculture and had brought influences to bear in that department which succeeded in suppressing this important official document; that we did that at the instance of the Florida East Coast Railroad Co., a corporation in my State, owned and controlled by Mr. Flagler; that Senator Taliaferro and myself were under the control of this railroad company; and that we exercised this influence which they said we had over this great department to suppress this document at the instance of the railroad company, which railroad company, the article stated, owned large areas of land in that territory which it wanted to sell, and if the Everglades were drained and the land put upon the market they would come in competition with the holdings of the Florida East Coast Railroad Co. In other words, Mr. Speaker, that Senator Taliaferro and myself were simply the tools of the railroad company, owned by them, and that we had to do their bidding; that we did it and had this document suppressed.

Knowing that to be absolutely false so far as I was concerned, I at once proceeded to have an investigation. I wrote the Secretary of Agriculture and demanded to know of him if I had ever approached him along the line of securing the suppression of any documents in his office. He answered me that not only had I not, but that his understanding of my position was that I had always insisted upon the publication and distribution of the document, contending that the people of this country had the right to the information contained in it. Later on I found that Senator Taliaferro had made no such request. I knew, Mr. Speaker, that the Secretary had informed me in the presence of witnesses that this circular letter had been suppressed by him at the instance of the persons engaged in selling the Everglades lands.

I knew that I had not asked him to suppress it. All admit now that I made no request for its suppression, but on the contrary always insisted upon its publication. So, Mr. Speaker, when that charge vanishes into thin air it remains for the governor of Florida—God pity the State—to travel all the way to Washington and put in public print the intimation that I am now acting at the "instigation of the railroads of the West."

Mr. Speaker, from my place I brand that intimation as a base, vile, uncalled-for, deliberate falsehood, whether it comes from the governor of the State of Florida or anybody else. He says "the people of Florida are aroused by charges made by Representative FRANK CLARK that the reclamation of 4,000,000 acres of swamp land is only a scheme to further the interests of a coterie of land corporations." Mr. Speaker, I have never made any such charge. The statement that I have is a base fabrication, without the warrant of one scintilla of truth. I have always said, Mr. Speaker, that I was not opposed to the drainage of the Everglades as a work of internal improvement. I have been opposed, I am now opposed, I shall continue to be opposed to the outrageous exploitation of those lands by a lot of conscienceless land sharks, to the disgrace of my State and to the thievery of millions of dollars [applause], and if I have not enough honest voters in my district to stand by me in electing me to Congress upon an honest platform like that, God knows I do not want to be here. [Applause.]

By the way, the governor of my State, before he was governor, was interested in some land exploitations not in the Everglades, and it may be, Mr. Speaker, that "a fellow feeling makes him wondrous kind." He has exploited land, and it may be that the governor's great heart goes out in warm sympathy for these people exploiting the Everglades; and they are exploiting them, let me tell you. Only yesterday one of the most prominent citizens of my district, living on the edge of the Everglades, told me that he saw not long ago in a paper called the Florida Home Seeker, a picture of a negro and a mule and a plow standing in the tall grass, almost covered with its luxuriant growth. It appeared to him in the picture as a broad prairie. The negro was holding the handles of the plow just as though he was ready to start a furrow. This gentleman told me that in his little town he saw the photographer who took that picture, which was in the literature of one of these shark companies. That photographer told him that the negro and mule and plow were on a flatboat, pushed out into the tall grass, and that he, the photographer, sat in a rowboat when he took the picture. [Applause and laughter.]

That is the character of performance that I am protesting against. For the honor of my State I am fighting such conduct as that. [Applause.] Listen to this:

MIAMI, FLA., February 24, 1912.

Hon. FRANK CLARK,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am inclosing you a circular letter sent out by one of the Everglade companies and received by me over a year ago.

I bought contracts from this company upon the direct representation that the lands at that time were ready for cultivation. If not found so upon investigation my money was to be refunded. It was not.

The inclosed "bunk" was sent through the mails with the fraudulent intention of deceiving purchasers into believing these lands fit to plant, while, as a matter of fact, it was still under water. Go for them. Very truly, yours,

J. N. RANDALL.

Mr. Randall came there from Long Beach, Cal. So they have gone all over this country. They have bled everybody, they have stolen, they have robbed men and women in all of this land. They have made homes unhappy, they have depleted the little savings of working people right in this city, and yet the governor of my State says that when I attack these thieves and plunderers I am making an attack upon Florida. God help Florida if that is true. [Applause.] But, Mr. Speaker, the insinuating part of this article lies here. Gentlemen are all around me who were on the trip coming back from Key West. Gentlemen are right here who stopped at Lauderdale, and they know what took place. They know that we only had an hour and a half to stop there, distinctly understood. Call on my friend, Mr. PADGETT, of Tennessee, or some of these other gentlemen, and let them tell you how some of these land sharks got charge of some of the faster boats on which were Brother PADGETT and a lot of others, and how they ran miles up the river and kept them over four hours, and one of them deliberately told PADGETT, "CLARK never would come to look at these Everglades. We have got you fellows and you have got to see them. We have shanghaied you."

Mr. BATHRICK. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Certainly.

Mr. BATHRICK. Is it not a fact some of the gentlemen upon that boat that went up the Everglades were carried to a farm known as the Davie farm, in the Davie ditch section—

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I believe so.

Mr. BATHRICK. And is not it a fact that after all these representations respecting frost in Florida where the representatives of these companies had stated this section was below the frost line—is it not a fact about the 7th or 8th of February of this year all the vegetables upon that same Davie farm were destroyed by frost?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I do not know.

Mr. BATHRICK. I will say that it is true.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, the governor says, so this reporter says, and I presume he reported it correctly—my experience with newspaper reporters in Washington is that they generally get a fellow pretty straight, and I apprehend that the governor said it—that when we had gotten up to a certain point that I said:

"Gentlemen, here are the Everglades. You see what they are. This is all there is to see. Let us go back, as I have an engagement with Mr. Flagler at Palm Beach," and toward Palm Beach his boat was turned immediately.

That is absolutely untrue, not that I disclaim association and acquaintance with Mr. Flagler. I am not a groundling. I am not ashamed to acknowledge the acquaintance and the friendship of a man who has builded a glorious country out of what was a wilderness before. [Applause.] But this little pin-headed governor [laughter] thought it would hurt me politically in my district to associate me with Mr. Flagler. That is why he drew in the name of Mr. Flagler. He thought that would cost me some votes. But he is mistaken. The intelligence of the constituency of the second congressional district of Florida averages much higher than the intelligence of the governor of Florida. [Laughter and applause.] "I am confident that the investigation in progress will prove his charges to be unfounded." What were my charges? Simply this and nothing more. I said that a certain circular letter on the subject of the Everglades sent out by the department was suppressed. I said that the Secretary told me that he suppressed it at the instance of persons engaged in selling Everglade lands.

Then I asked the committee to ascertain who those people were and why this document was suppressed. I will prove everything I have said by testimony that even the governor of Florida, with his limited ability to weigh facts, will be able to discover establishes the truth of the charge. Ah, Mr. Speaker, I have made no fight upon this project. I have not said that the lands were good or bad. I do not know. The only thing I have contended against is this conscienceless exploitation of these lands, making misrepresentations, and publishing and circulating deliberate falsehoods in reference to them.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Florida yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes, sir; for a question.

Mr. AKIN of New York. I wanted to make a statement in regard to a letter which I received a few days ago from a gentleman who is now down in Florida investigating the Everglades as to purchasing some land. He said that while down there he met a gentleman from Iowa who had bought some of this Everglade land by mail, and had come down there to see it, and he made this remark: "I have bought land by the section; I have bought land by the acre; I have bought land by the foot; but, my God, I have never bought land by the gallon." [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, the governor undertakes to put me in the attitude of attacking the interests of my State. Gentlemen upon this floor who have been here during my term of service know that I have never lost an opportunity to paint the beauties of that fair State and tell in my humble way of her charms. [Applause.] I have done all I could to represent her faithfully and well. Whenever her fair fame has been attacked I have always come to her defense. The governor of Florida by this silly and untruthful attack can not injure me among the people, because they know it is false. In spite of him, in spite of the land thieves, for whom he speaks, the intelligent, honest democracy of that district, unless I mistake the signs of the times, will again express their confidence in me by sending me back to this great body. [Loud applause.]

And I shall continue to stand for honest dealing as I see it. I shall condemn those things which I believe reflect upon my State and my people, and I shall advocate those things which I believe will inure to their good and preserve their honor. [Applause.]

If standing for honesty, if standing for right, if standing for truth is to defeat me, then I do not want a seat here or anywhere else. If I can not hold a commission from an honorable constituency upon an honorable basis, I would prefer to go back home, and, if need be, settle on some beautiful little spot alongside of one of our lovely lakes and spend my time among the yeomanry of that district, who are my friends, and aid them in making "two blades of grass grow where only one grew before."

Mr. Speaker, I have in this transaction simply denounced wrong. I have simply inveighed against dishonor. I have simply denounced theft. No man can make me believe that when I am doing that I am bringing discredit upon my State. I stand for Florida first. I love the State, her people, and her interests. When I shall go down to rest it will be in her bosom, in her generous soil, among the people who have been so good to me, and I shall sleep in the sands of that great State, whose people I know do not approve or indorse dishonor and theft. [Applause.]

INVESTIGATION OF STEAMSHIP LINES.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution of the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

House resolution 425 (H. Rept. No. 392).

Resolved, That the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries be, and is hereby, empowered and directed to make a complete and thorough investigation of the methods and practices of the various steamship lines, both domestic and foreign, engaged in carrying our over-sea or foreign commerce and in the coastwise trade and the connection between such steamship lines and railroads; and to investigate whether such ship lines have formed any agreement, conferences, pools, or other combinations among each other or with railroads for the purpose of fixing rates and tariffs or of giving rebates, special rates, or other special privileges or advantages, or for the purpose of pooling and dividing their earnings, or for the purpose of preventing or destroying competition; also to investigate as to what method, if any, is used by such shipping lines, foreign or domestic, and railroads to prevent the publication of their methods and practices in the United States; also to investigate and report to what extent and in what manner any foreign nation has subsidized or may own any vessel engaged in our foreign commerce; also to investigate and report to what extent any ship lines and companies engaged in our foreign or coastwise or inland commerce are owned or controlled by railway companies, or by the same interests and persons owning or controlling railroad companies; and said committee shall further investigate whether the conduct or methods or practices of said foreign steamship lines are in contravention of our commercial treaties or in violation of our laws, and what effect said methods and practices have on the commerce and freight rates of the United States; and shall further investigate what effect such combinations, agreements, and practices of railroads and our coastwise and inland shipping lines or of railroads and over-sea shipping lines, whether domestic or foreign, if any are found to exist, have on the commerce and freight rates of the United States, and whether the same are in violation of any law of the United States.

SEC. 2. That said committee shall report to the House all the facts disclosed by said investigation, and what legislation, if any, it deems advisable in relation thereto.

SEC. 3. That said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby empowered to sit and act during the sessions or during the recess of Congress at such place or places as may be found necessary, and to require the attendance of witnesses, the production of books, papers, and other documents, by subpoena or otherwise, to swear such witnesses and take their testimony orally or in writing.

SEC. 4. That said committee is hereby authorized to employ such counsel and experts and clerical and other assistance as shall be necessary to perform its duties hereunder.

SEC. 5. That the Speaker shall have authority to issue subpoenas for witnesses, upon the request of the committee, during the recess of Congress in the same manner as during the sessions of Congress.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that any debate is necessary. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] desire time?

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to debate the resolution. I quite approve of it. It is not a new subject, as a similar resolution was before the Committee on Rules in the last House, and while the text of this resolution was somewhat changed, I think it has been changed for the better. I have not any doubt from the various hearings by the committee, both in the last Congress and in this, that it is proper there should be such an investigation.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 13570. An act to amend an act entitled "An act granting to certain employees of the United States the right to receive from it compensation for injuries sustained in the course of their employment," approved May 30, 1908.

NATIONAL DRAINAGE CONGRESS.

Mr. DUPRE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Record, in connection with the remarks which I made yesterday, submitting an invitation to this body to attend the sessions of the Drainage Congress shortly to be held in New Orleans, certain extracts included in a telegram received from the New Orleans Board of Control of that Congress. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRE] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the telegram referred to:

National Drainage Congress will voice desire of entire country for adoption by Federal Congress of a broadly constructive policy of reclamation by drainage and river regulations. There is no intention to ask the Federal Government to drain any man's land. Drainage Congress will ask that Federal Government survey all wet lands, solve interstate problems, furnish adequate drainage arteries into which local drainage may flow, and so regulate the flow of navigable rivers as to conserve their water and prevent destructive floods. In all of the factory towns of the East and North there is now an overcongestion of food consumers. Drainage Congress will give great impetus to drainage, to the canalization of the Ohio River, to the building of the Lake Erie and Ohio River ship canal, and to flood prevention. The millions of non-producers congested in manufacturing centers deplete the country population. High cost of living results, because consumers increase faster than producers. That condition may be reversed by enormous increase of food production from 24,000,000 acres of land to be reclaimed in Arkansas, Missouri, Mississippi, and Louisiana alone. Louisiana's 10,000,000 acres of alluvial lands will produce more than a billion dollars' worth of food every year. Cheap water transportation will exist from every farm in Louisiana to every seaboard city. Complete Lakes to Gulf waterway, canalize Ohio River from Pittsburgh to Cairo, and build Lake Erie and Ohio River ship canal, and food from Louisiana's winter garden farms can then go by water to the large interior manufacturing centers.

NEW ORLEANS BOARD OF CONTROL,
NATIONAL DRAINAGE CONGRESS.

AGRICULTURE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 18960) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18960, the Agriculture appropriation bill, with Mr. BORLAND in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18960, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18960) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose on March 2, it had under consideration the paragraph on page 21, line 18, "For the investigation and improvement of sugar-producing plants, including their utilization and culture, $30,795," to which there was pending an amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]. I think this matter was discussed fully pro and con, and all I have to submit now for the information of the committee is what Dr. Galloway said in detailing his projects along this line. After treating of the work touching beet-sugar culture, he says:

This comprises a study of sugar-cane diseases, of problems affecting maple sap in connection with the Vermont Experiment Station, and a small amount of work on sorghum. The necessity of concentrating the efforts of the office force on the more urgent problems and the difficulty experienced in securing a competent pathologist for the sugar-cane investigation have led us to mark time on this group of projects. Considerable work has been done on the maple-sap problem. In the coming season no increase has been asked for in these projects. The policy will be to push the work on sugar-cane diseases more actively next year if a trained man can be secured.

There you have the judgment of Dr. Galloway as to the necessity for this extension of the amount for this sugar project, and I am willing to submit it to the House on what has been said, unless my friend from Texas [Mr. GARNER] wishes to speak further.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I could not catch quite the entire language of Dr. Galloway in regard to the investigation of diseases of the sugar-cane plant. Does he assert that this appropriation is adequate for the investigation of the current year?

Mr. LAMB. He said it would be the policy to push the work on sugar-cane diseases more actively next year if a trained man can be secured; the fact being, as he states it, that he has not at present a trained pathologist in this business to prosecute it successfully now, and he wants to mark time, so to speak, to use his own language.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. Does the gentleman infer from that that the investigation of diseases of sugar-cane plants this year must of necessity be limited?

Mr. LAMB. Exactly. He has $37,000, you know, and he is employing part of that; and he says he does not expect to do much this year, but to delay to another year.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. His intention is to make such investigation as he can this year?

Mr. LAMB. That is what I understand.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. And the appropriation is adequate for that purpose?

Mr. LAMB. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word to the committee on this amendment for the benefit of gentlemen who were not here last Saturday. The sole purpose of this amendment is to establish experiments in the Rio Grande Valley, in the State of Texas. I am not going to take the position in the House that Dr. Galloway is incapable of finding a man qualified for doing this work, because if I took that position I would be compelled to take the position that Dr. Galloway himself is not the man fitted to conduct the business of the Bureau of Plant Industry, and I do believe he is the man best qualified to carry on that work in the United States.

When anyone undertakes to convey the idea to this House that you are unable to find a man in the United States to carry on this work, it seems to me it is perfectly ridiculous. For instance, this bill does not take effect until July, 1912, and runs along until July, 1913. The object of this amendment is to secure sufficient funds to experiment with cane and beet sugar in the Rio Grande Valley, a new country, with a new soil, new climatic conditions, with irrigation projects such as you have not in the Middle West or in Louisiana. In other words, it is an entirely new situation. I submit for the benefit of the committee that the manner in which these experiments have been made has been unfair. I quote from a statement prepared by the Bureau of Plant Industry with reference to this work. It is now being carried on at two points in Colorado, one in Wisconsin, one in Kansas, one in Georgia, and I do not doubt but what the Rio Grande Valley will produce, in the next year or two, more sugar than either State that I have referred to. And it does seem to me, out of the $30,000, some experiments, some demonstration work, some opportunity may be had, that the small farmers in the valley may have the same assistance and the same consideration that the beet growers of the West and the South have had.

Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 21, lines 19 and 20, strike out the words "thirty thousand seven hundred and ninety-five dollars" and insert the words "fifty thousand dollars."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of Agriculture has informed us that there are within the continental boundaries of the United States at least 274,000,000 acres of land that are adapted to the cultivation of the sugar beet. In addition to that I think it is the opinion of those best informed that there is an area of not less than 12,000,000 to 15,000,000 acres adapted to the cultivation of sugar cane, or more than 10 times the area on which sugar cane is now cultivated. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] has just eloquently explained to the Committee of the Whole what a vast area there is in his district that could profitably produce sugar cane.

Of the total consumption of sugar in the United States, amounting, in 1910, to 3,350,355 tons, we produced in this country 333,006 tons of cane sugar and 457,000 tons of beet sugar. It would not be necessary to utilize one-twentieth part of the land which is fit for the growing of cane and sugar beets in the United States to produce all of the sugar that we consume. It is estimated that there is invested in the beet-sugar industry of the country something like $100,000,000. The probability is that we have a still larger investment in the cane-sugar industry. Yet these two industries produce less than 800,000 tons out of the 3,350,000 tons which we consume. So here is an opportunity for building up a domestic industry which will call for an additional investment of at least $600,000,000.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption there?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. AUSTIN. I should like to ask the gentleman what effect the proposition to put sugar on the free list will have on the development of this industry?

Mr. MONDELL. Of course it will wipe out the industry we now have and will prevent any further extension of it, but I am not assuming that sugar is going on the free list. The election of a Republican President and House of Representatives will prevent that.

Mr. LEVER. Do not be too sure about that.

Mr. MONDELL. I am discussing this matter just as though the catastrophe that seems now to impend will not be realized. As a matter of fact, I am inclined to the opinion that if the gentlemen on the other side had the opportunity at this time to put upon the statute books the legislation they propose, and upon which they have taken caucus action, they would hesitate a long time before they would do it.

We have an opportunity to enlarge the sugar industry to an extent that would require the investment of at least half to three-quarters of a billion of dollars and give employment to at least 100,000 American citizens.

That is the opportunity presented to us in the extension of the sugar industry in cane and in beet; and it seems to me that in view of the importance of this industry, in view of its great value to the country, we should expend a larger sum than is provided for in the item now before us, and that $50,000 would be a very small sum to expend in making the investigation that would lead to the extension of this important industry.

In the State which I have the honor to represent on this floor we have at least a half million acres of land that are suitable to the cultivation of the sugar beet.

[The time of Mr. MONDELL having expired, by unanimous consent he was given five minutes more.]

The great State of Colorado, to the south of us, no better land, no better climate than we have, has 17 sugar-beet factories. The State of Montana, to the north of us, has one large sugar-beet factory. Nebraska, to the east, has two factories, and the three factories that I have last referred to all receive a large proportion of their sugar beets from Wyoming.

We have long been looking forward to the time when the sugar-beet industry would be extended in our country. A number of years ago the Government undertook to aid the development of the arid West through the national reclamation law. We have expended approximately $60,000,000, and between $25,000,000 and $30,000,000 are available when needed for extension of that work. These great irrigation projects, or a number of them, depend for their success very largely on the opportunity afforded for the cultivation of sugar beets and the manufacture of beet sugar. We deliberately undertook this great national work and dedicated to it the income from the public lands, with the understanding that the progress and prosperity and success of these enterprises largely depended on the extension of the beet-sugar industry.

Of course, we realized then, as we realize now, that this industry is dependent upon a protective tariff; that it is absolutely impossible in a temperate climate and with the American wage, under American conditions, to produce cane sugar in competition with the peon-grown cane sugar of the Tropics.

No man whose opinion on the subject is worthy of consideration will claim for a moment that it is possible to maintain under the American flag within our continental confines a cane-sugar industry in free competition with the cane-sugar industry of Java or Borneo or Cuba. That being the case, we understand the still more difficult conditions surrounding the sugar-beet grower. It is scarcely necessary to refer to the fact that the beet-sugar industry is absolutely dependent on a protective tariff. Even in Germany, where the average wage paid to the workers in the field is just about a third, or a little more than a third, of that in our Northwest, where the average wage in the factory is less than half that paid in American factories, the industry would be wiped out if it were not for the protective tariff which guards it. How much more is that tariff essential to our development? [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the current appropriation law carries $32,355 for the investigation of sugar-producing plants, including their utilization and culture. The bill under consideration carries $30,795. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] has offered an amendment increasing that amount by $5,000, and I understand the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has offered an amendment increasing it to $50,000. I am somewhat interested in the position of the gentleman from Texas. A short time ago we had under consideration a proposition to make a slight increase in the appropriation for the investigation and the establishment of standards of cotton; when the vote came before the House the gentleman from Texas rallied the Democratic hosts from the nooks and corners and brought in a large aggregation of gentlemen who had not heard the debate who voted against the amendment and succeeded in defeating it. Then the gentleman from Indiana offered an amendment to provide an appropriation for the investigation of diseases of corn; and again the gentleman from Texas rallied the Democratic Members out of the by-ways of the Capitol and succeeded in defeating that amendment. Then the gentleman from Tennessee offered an amendment to increase slightly the appropriation for the investigation of the improvement of tobacco, and so forth, and the gentleman from Texas rushed to the corridors and lobbies and rallied the Democratic Members who had not heard the debate, although on this occasion he did not succeed in defeating the amendment.

On every proposition that has come up, until sugar was reached, the gentleman from Texas has performed the onerous duty of rallying the Democratic Members to stand with the committee.

It only illustrates how we are all influenced more or less by local considerations. I do not know who the committee have selected now to rally the Members on that side of the House to support the committee against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], but I suppose somebody will bring in the Speaker and the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means from their private rooms to stand by the committee now as the gentleman from Texas did upon the other amendments.

Mr. Chairman, one of two things is quite certain. If the Democratic proposition for free sugar is to prevail, we ought either to strike out the entire provision for this item or else increase it. I am inclined to think that if the Democratic proposition for free sugar prevails no sum of money appropriated for the investigation of sugar-producing plants will be of any very great avail, and yet even with that threat in our face I would not be willing to abandon the possibility of so increasing our capacity for the production of sugar by the improvement of sugar-producing plants that I would be willing at this time to strike out the appropriation. I hope the gentleman from Texas, having now worked himself up to the point where he is willing to increase the appropriation by $5,000, to be used in his district in Texas, will go along the line a little further and support the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], so that the appropriation can be increased for the benefits of other parts of the country. Certainly the gentleman from Texas is not desirous of increasing it by merely $5,000 to be expended in his own district in Texas. Surely he will be willing to increase it enough so that they can maintain an experiment station in the State of Wyoming and in other places where we can produce sugar beets, in the hope that the Republicans may somewhere along the line prevent the destruction of the industry through the passage of the bill reported into the House this morning.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is always listened to attentively by this House, and for that reason I did not object and was perfectly willing for him to have five minutes longer in the hope that he would give us some more scriptural illustrations and speak as a preacher, as he usually does in this House. His amendment is just exactly five times worse than the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a little Scripture right there?

Mr. LAMB. Certainly; we need some.

Mr. MONDELL. This may not be literally correct, but is practically so: "He who forgetteth his own household is worse than an infidel." [Laughter.]

Mr. LAMB. "He who faileth to provide for his own household." I am not much of a preacher, but I can correct the gentleman sometimes on Scripture. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the same reasons that apply to refusing the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] to increase this appropriation by $5,000 apply with five times greater force to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

I would not take the time, if I had it, to make any reply to my genial friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who has always got something to say about the action of the Democrats. Let me tell you, my friends on both sides of the Chamber, that it makes no difference to me, having charge of this bill, whether an amendment comes from a Member on this side or upon that side of the aisle. [Applause.] I shall consider it, and I think this committee will, upon its merits, and not with a view of whether it is offered by a gentleman on one side or the other of the two contending parties in this country.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMB. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I want to know if the department made any recommendation concerning this appropriation for this purpose?

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that the gentleman has asked that question. If I were to answer in full these other gentlemen I would refer to that, and perhaps I would better do it now. If this were of such magnitude as to require the attention of these gentlemen, and if my friend from Wyoming was looking after his own household, as Scriptures enjoin, why did not he and they come before the committee and have the matter investigated? No more was asked in the estimate. We gave all that the department asked in this matter, and I have quoted to you to-day what Dr. Galloway has said about this project.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Will not the gentleman from Virginia pardon the department, as well as the gentleman from Wyoming and myself, upon the theory that we did not anticipate that there was going to be a free-sugar bill brought into this House any more than did the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. LAMB. My friend knows just as much about what that free-sugar bill is going to amount to as I do.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I have no doubt that we will not disagree about that.

Mr. LAMB. It is not in the equation.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. That legislation will fatten the refineries and impoverish the beet people. Mr. Chairman, I want to submit just one word to the gentleman from Virginia in behalf of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The beet-sugar industry is the one that needs this education—that is, the grower of the beet. Now, the gentleman from Texas, with his $5,000—if he wants that expended down there—is not entitled to any consideration whatever, for the reason that the cane-sugar business is as old as the history itself, whereas the beet-sugar industry—the kind of seed to use, the kind of soil to plant it in, the kind of cultivation to make of the plant—is entirely new and growing in importance every day; and if this country, which only produces one-third of the sugar consumed by the American people, expects ever to get any additional sugar grown in this country or manufactured, it must be from beets.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt to make a statement to the gentleman from Colorado. I know the gentleman does not want to be unfair. They are growing sugar beets in the Rio Grande Valley. It is a new territory, and there they are testing both cane and beets; and for the gentleman to say that the appropriation I have suggested is not to be considered, when it should be considered in fairness to both sides, seems to me perfectly ridiculous.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I did not so understand the gentleman.

Mr. LAMB. The gentleman has taken me off my feet, and if it had not been that the gentleman is an old soldier I would not agree to it. However, he looks too young to be a soldier. I desire to say that two-thirds of this money is used for this beet culture.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I understand; and if there were fifty thousand more—

Mr. LAMB. Yes; but—

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. And if this fifty thousand were appropriated, it would be two-thirds of that. I am sure that if the gentleman will call up the Secretary of Agriculture, he will recommend $50,000 for that purpose.

Mr. LAMB. Let us proceed now—

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I am going to vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MANN. I ask to have the amendment reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, lines 19 and 20, strike out the words "thirty thousand seven hundred and ninety-five dollars" and insert the words "fifty thousand dollars."

Mr. MANN. That is the amendment to the amendment. I asked to have the amendment reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment which was reported by the Clerk was the amendment to the amendment. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 19, strike out the word "thirty" and insert the word "thirty-five."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the yeas seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. RUCKER of Colorado) there were—ayes 54, yeas 46.

Mr. LAMB. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers (Mr. LAMB and Mr. MONDELL) reported that there were—ayes 67, yeas 59.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs upon the amendment of the gentleman from Texas as amended.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. MANN and Mr. GARNER. Division, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANN. This vote is on the amendment as amended, precisely the same proposition is now being put.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 46, yeas 56.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers (Mr. LAMB and Mr. MONDELL) reported that there were—ayes 57, yeas 61.

So the amendment as amended was not agreed to.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment. I move to strike out "thirty," in line 19, page 21, and insert "thirty-six."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 19, strike out the word "thirty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty-six."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the yeas seemed to have it.

Mr. GARNER. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 8, yeas 27.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 20, page 21, insert the following:

"To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to meet the emergency caused by the continued spread of the chestnut-bark disease by continuing the study of the nature and habits of the parasitic fungus causing the disease, for the purpose of discovering new methods of control, and by putting into application methods of control already discovered, $80,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of which $20,000 shall be immediately available. And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend said appropriation in such a manner as he shall deem best, in cooperation with the authorities of the States concerned or with individuals; and to pay all necessary expenses for the employment of all investigators, local and special agents, experts, assistants, and all labor and other necessary expenses, including rent, in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, as may be required: Provided, That of this sum an amount not exceeding $10,000 shall be used in the study of the relation of insects to the chestnut-bark disease."

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that, but if my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore] will allow me to make a statement of two minutes I think he will withdraw his amendment.

We have already a provision in this bill for the chestnut blight, and in addition to that we have a bill before our committee on which we are perfectly willing to hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania at any time, to make a separate, distinct, and independent provision for this, as we did for the Mediterranean fly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman for that statement. Of course, there is a great deal of interest in this question. I realize that the gentleman can make a point of order, but I thank him for having reserved it in order that this statement could be made, and I also thank the gentleman for having given the assurance that this question may again be heard by the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman does that I certainly would like to have five minutes, which, of course, I can get by moving to strike out. The gentleman will save time by allowing me that amount of time.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD rose.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will tell the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Shackelford] the same thing.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, there are so many bills here that are dragging, and we are wasting so much time, that I make the point of order against this amendment.

Mr. LAMB. I think we will save time by reserving the point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So do I.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I do not want to interfere with another gentleman's committee, but I think we are wasting much time here. I will withdraw the point of order, however, at this time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The point of order is not withdrawn, it is reserved.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, all I desire now is to present this matter under the five-minute rule. I am not going to argue the point of order, but I wish to say that I sit here patiently during the consideration of a bill of this kind and listen to other gentlemen present claims in behalf of matters that affect their States, and I think if I am willing to do my part to assist those who desire to stop the ravages of the boll weevil, or who seek to investigate other questions affecting animal or plant life or the chemistry of the soil, and so forth, they ought to stop to consider a matter of importance to at least 10 States. The chestnut blight is as serious as is the boll weevil. It started somewhere in the vicinity of New York about 1904. It has now progressed over at least 10 States and is moving toward the South and toward the West. It is estimated that up to this time the loss of chestnut timber has amounted to over $25,000,000. Surely this is a matter that ought to have some attention and consideration from this House. One State may make an appropriation with a view of stopping the progress of this tree disease, as Pennsylvania has done, but if one State has jurisdiction only within the limits of the State, and the disease is passing over its lines, it is reasonable to ask that the Government of the United States, with its greater authority, step in and help a movement to check it.

My amendment was intended, Mr. Chairman, to have the Government aid in stopping the ravages of the chestnut blight. I realize it is subject to a point of order, but my purpose in introducing it at this time was to ascertain whether any provision had been made in this bill for investigating the blight. I question whether any adequate provision has been made on the part of the Government, but I am satisfied with the statement of the chairman of the committee that in due course the Committee on Agriculture will take this matter up and give it due consideration, and I thank him for that assurance.

I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Lamb] insists on his point of order. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

For taxonomic investigations and the study of methods for the improvement of grazing lands, $20,000.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting, on line 21, page 21, after the word "taxonomic," the following words, "and agrostological."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve a point of order.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, the only purpose of this amendment is that the examination or investigation now provided for under the appropriation, $20,000, taxonomic, is simply to classify the plants. Now, we want plants to grow on these public ranges. We have in the neighborhood of 130,000,000 acres, and we want the department, with this amount of money, to study the best kind of plants that will grow there and study the growing of plants, not the mere classification.

I called the attention of the department officials to this matter, and they seemed to think it would be a good amendment. They think they could do it by studying the growing and the method of growing instead of merely the classification. I hope the committee will accept this amendment. It does not add anything to the amount at all. It simply gives the department an opportunity to study the growth of the plants on these public ranges.

Mr. LAMB. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry, in summing up what he does under this provision, provides exactly for what my friend from California wants. His statement covers four or five pages here, and I do not want to take the time to read it. A point of order has been made against the amendment, and I ask for a ruling on the point of order.

Mr. RAKER. I hope the gentleman will not make the point of order. This amendment will give the department the power to do what they ought to do, and yet expend no more money.

Mr. LAMB. We hold that the department will do that without the amendment.

Mr. RAKER. If that is so, my amendment will do no harm; it will make it plain and give full authority to act.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, let me say to the gentleman from California that the department has been doing the very work he would have it do. They have been doing it for years and years all over this country. One division of this department is devoted to that very work. I insist on my point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, what is the point of order? This amendment is to study grasses. Is that subject to a point of order? It is one of the very purposes in the creation of the department.

Mr. LEVER. I concede that the amendment offered by the gentleman from California is not subject to a point of order. I reserve it, however, on the amendment.

Mr. RAKER. This is a question that ought to be considered. We apply to the department for investigations, and they return the answer that there is no provision in the bill by which they can make certain investigations. Now, I understand from the chairman that they have made this same kind of investigation. If that is the case, they have made it without any authorization of law. Why not permit this to be amended, to put it in shape so that when a request is made and when their attention is called to the matter and they desire to go out and make thorough investigations as to the growth of the plants and the kind and character of the plants that ought to be grown on these public ranges they can do so and not confine this item simply to the mere purposes of classifying the plants and grasses, but extend its scope for the purpose of getting forage, for the purpose of having vegetation grow upon those ranges for the use of which the permittees are now paying hundreds of thousands of dollars to this Government? The Government ought to be ready and willing to do this work, and this committee ought to be ready to vote favorably on the amendment.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; I certainly do.

Mr. KENDALL. Was I correct in understanding the gentleman to say that this amendment was submitted to the department and approved by it?

Mr. RAKER. I will say to the gentleman that I consulted with one of the officials of the department, and he said the amendment ought to go in.

Mr. KENDALL. I understand the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] to say that this work has been carried on for years?

Mr. LEVER. Yes. Here is a statement of Dr. Galloway, in which he says that work under this head consists of an investigation of economic grasses and other plants. I want to say further that perhaps the first year that I was elected to Congress Dr. Spillman, in charge of farm management work, which is carried in the bill in the next item, went through my district with his experts to teach my people what kind of grasses are best adapted for growing on our soil, and I understand the department for years has been doing this very work. The item at the foot of this page used to be called for the "Office of Agrostology," showing that the very character of work that the gentleman has in mind is now being done by the department and has been done by it for years.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The question of taxonomics has absolutely no relation on earth to the growth of plants, if you give it a proper definition. The question is, if by putting one word in there we can give the department the right to study the method of the growth of plants, and by that study we can increase our public ranges, ought we not to do it?

Mr. LEVER. Why load up the bill with unnecessary verbiage?

Mr. RAKER. It is only putting in two words, which will give the department the authority.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman takes the word "taxonomic," and seems to consider that that is the whole paragraph. Does not the gentleman consider that the study of methods for the improvement of grazing lands includes the study of grasses or anything that would come under the term "agrostology"?

Mr. LAMB. Not only so, but he says so here.

Mr. RAKER. The study of methods of improving grazing land is not a study of the plants grown upon the land.

Mr. MANN. Why, certainly. How else could he improve it?

Mr. RAKER. He can examine the soils, he can examine the climate; but we want him to examine the plants that the man pays for when he gets a permit to go on the ranges.

Mr. MANN. But we can examine them under this provision.

Mr. LAMB. Here is what he says under one of his projects: An inquiry into the best methods for the natural reseeding of overgrazed ranges.

Mr. RAKER. That is in another provision.

Mr. LAMB. It is under this very taxonomic treatment. I asked him to give me a statement of all these projects, and every project is under this head, right down here. There is so much of it that I would not burden the Record with it, but it answers the gentleman's question. There is no necessity for this. They are doing it now.

Mr. RAKER. Will the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture permit me to ask him this question?

Mr. LAMB. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. If by virtue of a few words you can make the language so specific that when the officers come to consider this question of the investigation and examination of the land for which the people are now paying this Government hundreds of thousands of dollars for rent and for range purposes, ought we not to make the language so specific that they can not say, "Oh, well, it is not provided for in this act and we can not consider it"? Why not make it plain? Why not make it specific, so that we who are paying hundreds of thousands of dollars for these public ranges may get some of the benefit of it?

Mr. LAMB. Because the suggestions for language in the bill must come from the department.

Mr. RAKER. I know; but they have not a monopoly of all the language there is.

Mr. LAMB. It is to be assumed that they know what they are doing.

Mr. RAKER. There are a few words remaining in the dictionary that they have not used there.

Mr. LAMB. They have used so many that there ought not to be any more inserted.

Mr. MANN. Which does the gentleman think would be the more intelligent, Members of Congress or others?

Mr. RAKER. Members of Congress. Others are intelligent also.

Mr. MANN. Is the appropriation for the improvement of grazing lands or for the study of agrostology?

Mr. RAKER. The study of the improvement of grazing lands.

Mr. MANN. But the study of the improvement of grazing lands necessarily carries with it a study of the methods of improvement, and the principal method is the study of the grasses or forage plants.

Mr. RAKER. They do not thus apply it.

Mr. MANN. They do thus apply it.

Mr. LEVER. Undoubtedly they do.

Mr. LAMB. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been withdrawn. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. RUBEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 19238. An act to amend section 90 of the act entitled, "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the Judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3211) authorizing that commission of ensign be given midshipmen upon graduation from the Naval Academy.

AGRICULTURE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

To investigate and encourage the adoption of improved methods of farm management and farm practice, $186,020.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 21, lines 25 and 26, strike out the words "one hundred and eighty-six thousand and twenty dollars" and insert in lieu thereof the words "two hundred and fifty thousand dollars."

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment, if adopted, will make available $250,000 instead of $186,020, an increase of about $65,000. I offer the amendment with some reluctance because I am a member of the Committee on Agriculture and a member also of the subcommittee upon whom devolved the work of preparing the final draft of the bill we are now considering.

Since the organization of the Department of Agriculture scientists, investigators, and experimenters have been at work gaining information to assist in better agriculture in this country. Acts of Congress have been passed to assist agricultural colleges in similar work. But there has been a lack of appropriation, a lack of means for carrying results of these investigations to the people in such a form that proper or reasonable use could be made of them. The acts of Congress providing appropriations for agricultural colleges to assist them in their work for the establishment of experimental stations actually forbids use of money so appropriated outside of the agricultural colleges themselves.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes.

Mr. TRIBBLE. The gentleman's amendment is for the purpose of establishing demonstration stations?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. It is to pay salaries and expenses of men to go from the Department of Agriculture to come into actual contact with farmers to show them better methods of farm management, and assist them in better cultural methods and the improvement of agriculture.

Mr. TRIBBLE. That is for farm demonstration?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Farm demonstration and farm management. There is some difference between farm demonstration and farm management, but although I have heard that difference described a number of times, I admit that for some reason I have been unable to understand it. I think they are so similar that one may be very properly taken for the other.

It has been said by presidents of agricultural colleges and the representatives of those colleges that have appeared before the Committee on Agriculture to urge appropriations of this kind that there are now in the Department of Agriculture in this city information and secrets of one kind and another, gained by investigators, that if taken to the farmers of this country and put up to them in such a way as to make it available agriculture will be revolutionized. We are met with the statement that the department is doing something to get this information to the people, and it is insisted that the information has been made available. We are pointed to the fact that bulletins covering these different matters have been issued and that the department is sending out men to take part in institutes and to lecture to the people, disclosing the secrets and information that the Government has gathered at great expense.

But you know, without being told by me, that these bulletins, many of them, are over the heads of the ordinary farmer; that he is unable to understand as he ought to understand the lectures given by these experts, and the only way information can be brought to the farmers of this country in such a way that a proper use can be made of it is to send the experts to the farmer himself.

[The time of Mr. McLAUGHLIN having expired, at the request of Mr. KENDALL, and by unanimous consent, he was given five minutes more.]

The only way by which the information can be taken to the farmers so that they can make proper use of it is by the expert going directly to the farmers themselves, and, as has been done in some parts of the country, teaching them better cultural methods and better farm management.

The Department of Agriculture has issued a map showing where its agents are located, many of them doing this very work. I would ask the attention of this committee to that map. It will be seen that the work is done largely in the States in the South, where it has been found more necessary, perhaps, than in the North, on account of the ravages of the boll weevil. I would not say one word against the necessity of that work or the character of the work. It has been necessary, it has been well done, it ought to be continued, and the appropriation providing for it, if changed at all, should be increased.

I do not call attention to the map for the purpose of discrediting or in any way reflecting unkindly on the work that is being done in the South or upon the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture in sending so many and such a large proportion of his men to the South. For instance, in South Carolina, as I count the number of men as indicated on the map, there are more than 40 agents and representatives of the Bureau of Plant Industry instructing the people in farm management and farm demonstration. In Virginia there are about 35, in North Carolina 35, in Georgia 55, in Alabama 56, in Mississippi 50, and in Texas 100. In the State of New York there are 3, and New York is a great agricultural State. When we read the story of agriculture as it is and has been carried on in the State of New York we are impressed with one feature, one chapter, which tells of deserted farms. Evidently there is need there of assistance and teaching in farm management. In the State of Pennsylvania there is 1 agent of this bureau. In the State of Ohio there are 2, in Indiana none, in the State of Illinois 2, and in the State of Michigan 1. And I may say that when I went, a short time ago, to the chief of the bureau and asked for men to go into my State of Michigan to carry on this kind of work he said that there was a lack of money and it was very doubtful if we would be able to do anything along that line. The committee has of its own accord increased this appropriation about $42,000, as I remember the figures, but the chief of the bureau tells me that that will pay the expenses of only 14 men, because the expense of each man is about $3,000, and that he has hundreds and hundreds of requests from different parts of the country. When he scatters those 14 men who would be added to the number over the entire United States, if he puts them all in the North, it will be seen that we will not then have anything like our fair proportion.

I will continue to read the allotment to the States of the North. In Wisconsin there are 2; Minnesota, 1; Missouri, 2; New Jersey, 1; Iowa, 2; Kansas, 4; Nebraska, 3; and Maine, 1. That is as far as I have gone, Mr. Chairman, in looking over this map and counting the number of stations that the department has located in States of the North.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman stated that the cost of these men is about $3,000 per man, but he has already enumerated enough men to more than make it at the rate of $1,000 per man. According to the appropriation, there is only $142,000 appropriated, and the gentleman has enumerated 55 men in one State alone.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Many of these men are paid out of the appropriation made by the next paragraph, at the top of page 22, for the study and demonstration of the best method of meeting the ravages of the cotton boll weevil.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Michigan may be extended for five minutes.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, we will never get through if we keep on at this rate.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the agricultural bill is taking no longer this year than it has always done.

Mr. LAMB. I do not know about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Michigan be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, many of the men in the South—and I was about to say all of them, but I am not sure of that—are paid wholly or in part out of the appropriation for the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton boll weevil, for which there is carried in this bill the sum of $332,960.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman mentions salaries that are paid to the 50 men in one State and the hundred in another, and so forth. Are those salaries entirely paid by the Federal Government, or is it not a fact that a number of those men have their salary supplemented by the localities and the General Education Board?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. That is true in some cases. A part of the salary of these men is paid, as the gentleman from Mississippi says, in that way.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. And the gentleman does not mean that each man costs the Government of the United States $3,000?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. It is about $3,000 a year for salary, traveling, and other expenses of the representative.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I know in my own State it is quite general that the counties employ men and as a rule pay half and sometimes three-fourths of the salary, the other being supplemented either by the fund provided by the General Education Board or by the Government.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. I would like to state in that connection that the State of Texas is paying $50,000, Arkansas $40,000, the State of Alabama $34,000, and other States various other amounts which I will not enumerate, making a total sum, which, together with the funds from other sources, amounts to practically the same as the amount appropriated by the National Government in the next paragraph, and my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], says amounts to a thousand dollars more. I am referring to the next paragraph respecting the boll weevil, since the gentleman has gone into it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, it is true—

Mr. HAUGEN. What did I understand the gentleman to say the amount expended in Texas was?

Mr. WICKLIFFE. Now $50,000; $46,000, I think, last year.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Many of the States of the South have contributed, as the gentleman from Louisiana says; but, notwithstanding that, a very large part of these appropriations is used in the South. Now, I have said I would not refuse that money, but if I were to make any change in the appropriation I would increase it so that the splendid work carried on in the South might be continued and even extended. When we learn of the development in the South—the wonderful results, entirely satisfactory—it justifies this Congress in the appropriations it has made, and I wish to have it distinctly understood that I would not cast a reflection upon the bureau for spending money in that way nor upon gentlemen upon this floor who have asked for the use of money for that purpose. I am simply asking for an increase of appropriation so that some other section of the country, needing it almost as badly, may have more of the work done there. As an illustration of the need of this work in the States of the North I want to tell you a little story that was told before our committee by the dean of the agricultural department of the University of Wisconsin, which he received from Prof. Hopkins, professor of soils in the department of agriculture of the University of Illinois. I had read it in Prof. Hopkins's book, "The Story of the Soil," but did not know until Dean Russell repeated it that it was an actual fact. I thought it was simply a story. The soil department of the university sent experts into a portion of Illinois to make experiments and to give demonstrations. The work accomplished was wonderful, and Prof. Hopkins tells about an old gentleman who came with his family—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has had 15 minutes, and I insist now that the time is passing; and I want to be frank—

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Let him finish his story.

Mr. LAMB. If you keep on this way, with blue Monday and holy Wednesday and pension Friday, we will be here the Fourth of July about these measures unless we get along a little faster.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will not make any time by cutting off gentlemen who have a right to talk.

Mr. LAMB. The Chair stated that the gentleman's time had expired.

Mr. MANN. I know, but gentlemen who really have something to say should have an opportunity to say it, or I shall insist upon a quorum being present.

Mr. LAMB. I will let him finish his story. Of course, it is very interesting; I have heard it before. I will be glad to have my colleague finish his story.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Chairman, reserving my right to object, I want to say that the gentleman has had 15 minutes to make a speech here. I only had 10 minutes the other day and did not finish my speech. Now, if he is going to continue in this way, I shall have to object. [Cries of "Too late!"]

Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. LAMB. I hope my friend from New York will withdraw his objection.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Well, I will withdraw the objection.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Prof. Hopkins told us the result of conducting experiments—I believe it was in the growing of oats—of a certain treatment of the soil that produced a magnificent crop, whereas upon adjoining and near-by farms the yield had been insignificant. He called about him the people of that section of the country to see what he had done. One old gentleman came with the members of his family. Upon their faces and upon their persons there appeared the marks of labor and of poverty. The old gentleman, when he saw what had been accomplished, broke down and said, "Why could not I have known this 20 years ago. I have the same kind of soil, and if I had only known how to treat the soil it would not have been necessary for me to bring my family up in poverty and ignorance." The professor said to him, "Why, you did have opportunity to know it; the department has issued bulletins; it has conducted institutes around here," and the old gentleman said, "I never could understand the bulletins, and when I attended the institutes I could not fully understand the lectures."

Now, I will say, Mr. Chairman, that unless this appropriation is increased, unless something is done to carry to the people of this country the information the scientists and the skilled men of the department have been gathering for years, the money we have already expended will be wasted and lost to the people of this country.

I will not further trespass upon the time of the committee. I thank you for the extension.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a plain statement about this matter and then ask my acting assistant—adjutant general here [Mr. LEVER]—whom I have requested particularly to study the plant-industry part of this appropriation bill, to answer my friend from Michigan.

My colleague [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] was on this subcommittee that made up this bill. He was also on the committee, of course, when it was being considered. We discussed this matter in all of its phases, and I regret exceedingly that he felt constrained to come here and offer an increase of this appropriation, which, by the way, is about the only large increase that we made in these estimates. And we did it for the reason that has been stated in part by my friend, namely, that we thought our brothers in the Central West and the abandoned farms in New York, as reported to us, should have some of the benefits that have accrued to the South from demonstration farm work during the inroads of the boll weevil and the appropriation of $300,000, or thereabouts, for the extermination of that pest.

We questioned Dr. Galloway; but I am not going to trespass upon what my friend is prepared to say on this question. I am sure you will consider this amount as fully satisfactory to the department. One word more before I close, and I wish to say that the good story related by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] suggests this thought. If you increase these appropriations you will thereby weaken the reasons given so strongly before our committee for an appropriation under what is known as the Lever bill. There are 16 of those bills before our committee. During the hearings on the Lever bill we had many fine addresses, which have been referred to—this story being in one of them—and I suggest to you, when the hearings are printed, to read them as an intellectual entertainment, for they will entertain you and furnish you with information at the same time. This Lever bill will give you exactly what you are asking to be done under this increase.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMB. I have not time in which to yield now.

The gentleman from South Carolina, my assistant adjutant general, will have more time and will reply to you. [Laughter.] This Lever bill, so called, I claim is the grandchild of the old Davis bill. The Page bill, which you have heard about over in the Senate, is really the child of the Davis bill, and I think in some respects will be better than its father, and I think the grandchild will be better than the child or its grandparent. The only reason, in my judgment, why it may not be passed at this session of Congress is because the revenues are behind the receipts from the customs duties by which we raise money, and through unconscious sources of taxation, I may say. Every increase you may make in this item weakens the force of the argument for the Lever bill.

Now, I yield to my friend.

Mr. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STONE] offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, lines 25 and 26, strike out the words "one hundred and eighty-six thousand and twenty" and insert the words "two hundred and fifty-one thousand."

Mr. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of an increased appropriation for this work. I think it is well understood, and the need of the extension of it is very easily discerned. I will merely state that during the last summer throughout the Northern States the farmers' institutes in the various counties and States passed resolutions calling upon Congress to extend this very work, so that the northern farmer could have the benefit of it the same as the southern farmer has at the present time.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate is not exhausted. The gentleman can speak in opposition if he wishes.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I desire five minutes in which to speak for the amendment. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important matter not only to the farmers all over the country, but especially to the farmers in that State which has not the honor of having a member on the Agricultural Committee. And we are berated here now because of the fact that we did not appear before this committee and call attention to many of the things which have been brought forward. That is unfair, because a lot of us would like to have been upon or before that committee, but we could not be there. In the first place, this boll weevil has stricken the South pretty nearly co-incident to a time when an evil disposition has struck it, because it has taken all of this pork barrel, apparently.

We have none of it in Colorado, a section where we need the most of it. We have an agricultural station there, maintained solely by the State, the State going to the entire expense, and we having no aid whatever from the Federal Government other than from the two agricultural stations which are located there, to which the farmer must go a long way for information.

As the gentleman from Michigan says, these bulletins fall too high above the heads of the ordinary farmer or else he has not the time to study them. We have the institutes of our agricultural colleges traveling all the time over the State, doing all they can, but it is entirely at the expense of the State of Colorado.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield to the gentleman from Louisiana?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. The gentleman stated that Colorado was getting nothing. I take the broad ground that this bill is absolutely nonsectional. Take, for instance, the State of Colorado. Here is an item carried in the bill of $69,000 for investigations connected with the utilization of lands reclaimed under the reclamation act and other areas in the arid and semiarid regions. Now, I do not mean, of course, to say that this is all for Colorado, but some of it, possibly a great deal of it, may be expended there or for the interest of that State; but I do hope the gentleman did not try to create the impression that this is a sectional bill. It is not sectional in any sense.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I did not mean it in that sense, and I beg the gentleman's pardon if he so understood me.

Mr. RAKER. What did the gentleman mean by the remark that only those Members who are on the committee have investigations made in their States?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I do not know what I said to mislead the gentleman, but I did not say anything like that.

Mr. RAKER. I understood the gentleman to say that only members of the Committee on Agriculture had appropriations made for investigations in their State.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. The gentleman misunderstood me altogether. It is unfortunate. It may be merely an unfortunate fact for the South that the South needed most of this money. I am not complaining of that; but I am complaining of the fact that we have not got enough in this appropriation to go all around, and that we need some of it in Colorado.

Now, for an illustration. For the last 30 years there have been periods when certain sections of that country were abandoned by the people who have gone there and undertaken, by the usual methods, to make a living on the land—abandoned because of the fact that they had not been educated up to the latest mode of farming these lands, namely, the Campbell system of soil culture, and it is upon that line that the State of Colorado is doing so much for the education of the people. It simply needs some more assistance, and that can only be had from the Federal Government. I am in favor of this amendment.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of this amendment. I want to say, in favoring it, that I do not think this bill is sectional, or that anyone believes that it is. The statements that have been made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] and by others are not made, in my judgment, in the spirit of criticism. So far as I am concerned, I am not finding fault with the gentlemen from the South because they have a large number of stations. I think it indicates commendable activity on their part. For example, as shown by this map, South Carolina has 41, Georgia has 60, Alabama has 64, Texas, 106, and so on. Among the northern States Pennsylvania has 15, Ohio 10, Wisconsin 8, and so forth. I am speaking of all the different establishments of the Department of Agriculture.

Now, that is perfectly natural, and we are asking for the same privilege for the northern States. These men that work in this demonstration work under the supervision of the Bureau of Farm Management are the ones that bring practical things home to the farmers. They are not talking about the technical details of the chemistry of soils, or the fine points of the fertilization of plants, but they talk about the practical things that the farmer wants to know. They come to the farmer and find out, for example, that he is not making the profits he ought to make on his farm; that the work is not being carried on economically. They study the farm as a whole. They take into consideration what problems are involved. They bring the technical information of the Department of Agriculture right home to the farmer, and in such a way that he will be able to use it.

Now, it must be perfectly obvious to gentlemen that, in order to do that it is not possible for one man to cover three or four States with his activities.

It is shown here in the hearings, for example, that one man has three States—Washington, Idaho, and Oregon. He states here in the hearings that he has been in this position for the past seven years and has not been able to go over all the territory once. Now, when we understand that the work of the bureau is largely personal work, it must be perfectly obvious to gentlemen, particularly those who are acquainted with the work of the department so far as it relates to the boll weevil, that if this work is to amount to anything it must be brought directly to the farmer. You can not do anything with one man for three States.

It has been suggested here that the States ought to cooperate. The Southern States are cooperating, and I commend them for it. I am not finding fault or complaining about anything here, except that we want the same help that is now being given to the Southern States—

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is there any reason why the very wealthy State of Ohio, and the State of Illinois, and other Northern States, which have experimental stations of their own, should not carry on this work, if it is so desirable?

Mr. WILLIS. Not at all.

Mr. MANN. Why do they not do it, instead of asking the Government to foot the bills?

Mr. WILLIS. They are doing it. If the gentleman will read the hearings at page 58 he will find, for example, just exactly what the State of Ohio is doing.

Mr. MANN. I say, why do they not do it, instead of asking the General Government to foot the bills? They have the money and the men.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask for a minute or two more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIS. In response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I want to say that the State of Ohio is cooperating in that work. She has appropriated $30,000, as different States in the South have done, and, in my judgment, that is perfectly proper and reasonable. It is a perfectly proper activity of the Government, and we are simply asking in behalf of the farming interests of the Northern States that the same system that has been wisely and properly applied in the study of conditions in the South shall be applied in the North. For example, I have made a little computation here. The great State of Michigan does not have a single establishment or location of the Bureau of Plant Industry under this bill. Ohio has 2; Pennsylvania has 1; South Carolina has 40; Indiana has none; Illinois has 2; Iowa has 2; Alabama has 54; Minnesota has 1; Nebraska has 5; Mississippi has 46; Kansas has 5; Colorado not a single one. I am not complaining about that. I think it is perfectly proper that these locations should have been made in the States where they have been made, but I am asking that the same sort of service be extended to the farmers in the Northern States that is already extended to the farmers in the Southern States.

Mr. LAMB. I move that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Make it five minutes.

Mr. LAMB. I think 20 minutes is about right.

Mr. HEFLIN. We have already consumed about 45 minutes, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia moves that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The question being taken, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose both the amendments—the one offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] and the one offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STONE].

I desire to call the attention of this committee to a few facts and a few misunderstandings in connection with this item in the bill.

In the first place, the Secretary of Agriculture recommended to the Agricultural Committee that we should increase this appropriation $50,000. The Committee on Agriculture have increased this item $50,000.

A Democratic committee has taken the recommendation of a Republican President and written it into this bill. We have given every dollar asked by the department for this work, and it does seem to me that this ought to be a fact which should have some weight with gentlemen on this side of the aisle at least, if not on the other side. I would not have this debate take either a political or a sectional turn; on the contrary, I am perfectly willing to debate it on its merits.

Mr. ELLERBE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. ELLERBE. I do not want to disturb the gentleman, but I want to ask him this question: I am disposed to vote for this amendment, because I am a great believer in this work. I think these people have a right to share in that work, and I want to ask my colleague and friend if he thinks $180,000 is all the money that can be profitably expended for this work this next year?

Mr. LEVER. My colleague is a gentleman who always goes to the foundation of any proposition, and has done so in this, and I am exceedingly glad he asked me that question. I do not propose to answer him in my own language, but in the language of Dr. Galloway, the chief of the bureau, who handles this work and ought to know what he is talking about. Here is his language:

Mr. LEVER. Assuming that the committee allows this increase you ask here for farm management, how many men would you likely employ with that money; how many States would you reach?

Dr. GALLOWAY. We would probably simply increase our present force in nearly all of the Northern States. What we need now, however, is not a large number of inexperienced men, but we need some good leaders to organize and direct it.

In that connection let me say to gentlemen on both sides that while the farm-management work does relate to farm-demonstration work, nevertheless it is as different from it as day is from night, and Dr. Galloway says so by inference and specifically.

Mr. LEGARE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Certainly.

Mr. LEGARE. How will the men ever become experienced if you do not employ them at some time?

Mr. LEVER. Let me say to my colleague that he overlooks this fact: That every State in this Union has an agricultural college and every State has an agricultural experimental station from which hundreds and thousands of boys are going out each year, and these are the men that ought to be the leaders of the community and ought to take up this line of work and will do it when they are available.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. I will yield to the gentleman in a minute or two. Now, Dr. Galloway, continuing, says:

I do not see where the country could get men to carry out some of the projects that have been proposed, unless they are organized on the basis of the work in the South.

The CHAIRMAN. That would argue that this work is proposed to be advanced further than you have men suitable to carry it on.

Dr. GALLOWAY. I think we could get, with this amount of money, enough men. If very large sums were appropriated, you would have to put inexperienced men in the country to tell the farmers what to do, and you would probably have a waste of money.

Is that the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture? Is it the statement of the gentleman from South Carolina? No; it is the statement of Dr. Galloway, the man who made the recommendation and the man who is to spend the money—the man who has charge of the work—and his statement ought to be conclusive.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. LEVER. I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. TRIBBLE. If there is not an agricultural college man in my district in charge of demonstrative work, and yet these demonstrators are capable, does not the gentleman's argument fail, and could not you get them from among the farmers?

Mr. LEVER. No. This is not the testimony of myself; it is the testimony of experts and men who know something about it; it is the testimony of men who have had experience.

Mr. TRIBBLE. The gentleman admits that the demonstrators are doing good work?

Mr. LEVER. This is not demonstration work. Let me tell the gentleman, and others who have got up a hullabaloo this morning on this proposition, that it is entirely different from the kind of work you are talking about and have in mind.

Mr. LEGARE. This is demonstration farm work.

Mr. LEVER. Not at all; it is not demonstration farm work; that is on the next page. Now listen. Dr. Galloway says:

You understand that in this farm-management work the final aim is not to reach the farmer through publication; the final aim is to reach the farmer through direct touch with the farmer. But that touch should be made in cooperation with the States, to the end of helping the individual farmer to readjust his entire scheme of farming operations, not by going on to his farm and making a simple demonstration, but by taking a farm, as a whole, and pointing out the ways in which he can readjust the whole proposition. That is a slow process and a costly process, and I think it ought to be done in the very closest touch with the States themselves.

In another part of his testimony he said that it would take $3,000,000 to do the work you gentlemen are talking about and think you are going to do by this amendment.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not true that this work which is now designated as farm management and farm practice would lead up almost directly to the work contemplated and referred to by the chairman of the committee in the Lever bill?

Mr. LEVER. Let me say that eventually I think that is true.

Mr. TOWNER. Then, will the gentleman allow me to follow that will another question? Does he not, then, think it would be to the advantage of his own bill and to the advantage of the whole country that this appropriation be so increased that these experienced men can be made available when they will be most needed under the operations of his own bill?

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman from Iowa fails to take into consideration the fact that we are increasing this item $50,000 in this bill. Let me say one word further, and these interruptions break the continuity of the argument, that this is not demonstration work, this is not the work that we have in the South, this is not taking up a few more than ordinarily intelligent farmers and having them go around and visit the various farms, giving the people a few of the fundamentals of agriculture. This is not that work at all. The Secretary of Agriculture in his report says that this important work will be carried on under four heads—studies of farm practice, cost or accounting and farm records, farm equipment, farm problems or extension work. They are taking a man and putting him in an area of 100 miles, perhaps, and telling him to study all of the various farms in that 100-mile area, and then come back to Washington and from his study of the various types of farms he has visited and studied, work out what in his mind is the best type of farm for that area over which he has traveled, and then give to those people the benefit of his judgment on that proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has again expired.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, that would leave only five minutes in which to reply to the gentleman.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. Already far more time has been consumed on the other side of this proposition.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Is that true, Mr. Chairman, that that would leave only five minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has adopted a resolution limiting debate on this proposition to 20 minutes. Ten minutes of that time has been already consumed.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I trust the gentleman will not take all of the time, because there is some of his statement that we would like to throw some light upon.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. The gentleman from South Carolina, of course, would speak now by unanimous consent. Practically all of the discussion has been upon the other side.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I do not object. I want the gentleman to have all of the time he desires, but we would like to have a little time in which to reply.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, going on with my statement, I want to make this distinction between the farm management work carried in this item and the farm demonstration work carried in the next item. The demonstration idea is built upon the idea that the Department of Agriculture through its agents carries to the farmer, onto his farm, the simple proposition of better agriculture as it is practiced in the community, while on the other hand, and it is a very vital distinction, the idea of the department under the item proposed to be amended is that its experts shall go out among the farmers and on the farms and there make investigations, gathering together data from which it is proposed to evolve a system or type of agriculture which can be spread broadcast over the country, probably by the demonstration method. In other words, one is a demonstration proposition and the other is an investigational and scientific proposition. The one kind of work can be built up in a short time, the other must of necessity go slowly. The chief of the bureau in charge of this work tells you in as plain language as he can tell you that he can not use more than he has asked for.

Mr. LEGARE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. LEGARE. Is it not true that they are doing this farm demonstration work, under the clause at the head of page 22, for the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton boll weevil.

Mr. LEVER. I have already said that, but it is demonstration and not farm management work. The two are as distinct as is investigation from an expert point of view from demonstration from a practice point of view.

Mr. LEGARE. If they can do it under that clause, why can they not do it under the clause providing for investigating and encouraging the adoption of improved methods of farm management and farm practice?

Mr. LEVER. Because one is demonstration, that which we of the South get, and the other is farm management, which the Secretary of Agriculture and those in charge say is quite another thing.

Mr. LEGARE. In other words, it is left to the department to put the construction they choose upon the language.

Mr. LEVER. No; the language itself controls. One is farm management and the other is demonstration.

A great deal has been said about the location of stations, as they are called, as appearing in this map. There is nothing to that. These men here indicated by these little round marks on the map, are men who are receiving, perhaps, a salary of $50 a month or $60 a month, for a period of from six to seven months in the year.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. WILLIS. I understood the gentleman to say that there was somewhere else in this bill a provision for the extension of this demonstration work. Where is the provision that would permit that extension as to the agricultural districts of the North?

Mr. LEVER. Well, I do not think I said that; if I did, I did not intend to say it.

Mr. WILLIS. Then, as a matter of fact, it is not intended in the provision to have this extension?

Mr. LEVER. I will say to my friend from Ohio I have introduced a bill which will cover, in a very general way, this proposition. Now, I want to say as to this southern proposition that the States of the South a few years ago were put up against the greatest emergency, in many respects, with which this country has ever been threatened—the ravages of the boll weevil. We did not come to Congress as a section of this country begging Congress to help us. We came here and appealed to a broader, bigger sentiment. We said this is a national problem; it is bigger than the South; it is bigger than Texas; it is bigger than South Carolina; and every interest and industry, every man, woman, and child in this country is vitally interested in the question as to the continuance of the growth of cotton. Congress took the national view of it and made these appropriations, the total amount of which in this bill is $332,000 in round numbers for this year. Now, look at what the States are doing, gentlemen. We of the South have recognized the enormous importance of this proposition, and we are appropriating this year from all sources $203,226.50, and that, added to the $130,000 which we are getting from the educational board, makes $333,000, or $1,000 more than the Federal Government is appropriating. Now, one word further.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Just let me complete this statement. If you will add up the number of these stations to which reference has been made in the South, the South Atlantic, and Southwestern States, you will find 1,619 of them, dividing that by 2, for we are furnishing half the money, you get 809, less than any other section of the country, according to the map. I hope, Mr. Chairman, this amendment will be voted down, because the department says it does not want and can not use the money to advantage. It is a good work, but we must let it grow gradually and in keeping with the recommendations of the men who are to expend it.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word; the time has not expired yet.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. WICKLIFFE. I ask for 2 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Are not gentlemen on this side entitled to be heard?

Mr. WICKLIFFE. I will say far more time has been consumed on the other side than on this side.

Mr. MANN. But where a committee limits debate to 20 minutes, can gentlemen on one side occupy all the time?

Mr. WICKLIFFE. I only ask for 2 minutes.

Mr. MANN. That makes no difference; where the committee fixes debate at 20 minutes, can one side of the proposition occupy it all?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair knows no rule governing—

Mr. MANN. I would like to inquire how much time is left?

The CHAIRMAN. A division of time is not made by the resolution, and the Chair must recognize gentlemen as they rise.

Mr. MANN. I know; but it is customary for the Chair, where debate is limited, to recognize first one side and then the other.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. How much time remains, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Five minutes.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. I will only consume 2 minutes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended 2 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks that the gentleman from Louisiana may proceed for 2 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. Mr. Chairman, practically the sole purpose I have in rising here is to remove, if possible, any impression whatsoever that may prevail here—though I believe it does not to any great extent—that this is a sectional bill. I take exception to the remarks made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN], and also by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], not charging directly that this bill is sectional, but subtly—in a manner by innuendo—indicating that it may be. I want to say now that if there is one committee above all others in the House of Representatives that has no politics in it, it is the Committee on Agriculture. [Applause.] When it comes to the matter of what is necessary for the farmers of this country we do not stop to ask whether it is the "foot-and-mouth disease" in Pennsylvania or New York, or whether it is the boll weevil in the South, or whether it is the gypsy and brown-tail moth in New England, or something in the West. We simply ask the question, Is it fair, just, and necessary? Have we the power to do it? And when the answers are affirmative to these questions we do it. Now, for instance, right here, if we want to balance things up.

I deprecate any such thing; I deprecate such a comparison. I do not propose to balance things up, and you should not do it. It is not fair, it is not just, it is not a just argument; but since you offer it let me call attention to the fact that the gypsy moth and the brown-tailed moth are confined to the States of New England, and those States are getting almost, if not entirely, as much in this very measure as is the item for the boll weevil in the South. But I do not want for a moment to make such a comparison, because I think it is invidious.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WICKLIFFE] has put the construction which he has on my remarks. There is nothing sectional in the bill, and there is no disposition to draw sectional lines by any member of the committee, nor have I heard any suggestion of it on this side of the House. We have simply been impressed with the value of the work done in the South, and we would like to have similar work carried on in the North.

Now, as to the difference between farm management and farm demonstration. I attempted to explain when I had the floor before that there are two departments of this work, and that there is some difference. But I wish to confess again that I have never been able to distinguish between them. I have asked gentlemen connected with the Department of Agriculture to explain to me the difference between farm management and farm demonstration, but, it may be my fault, I have never been able to understand their explanation. And I submit that the remarks made by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], whereby he undertakes to make this explanation and explain the difference between them, are confused, as are the statements that have heretofore been made to me, so far as they are really pertinent; and I suggest, without intending any reflection upon him, that he has made some misstatements, growing out of a misunderstanding himself as to what farm demonstration and farm management are.

Just another point, and I have finished—as to the supply of men that the department has and its ability to use this money. I went to the Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry at his own invitation to talk about work in Michigan, and we canvassed the situation. He told me that he had the men and could send them there, but that they did not have money with which to do it. I said to him, "We are going to increase that appropriation $44,000." "Yes," he said, "but that will employ only 14 men, or about that, because the expense of each one is about $3,000, and there are so many applications—hundreds of them from all parts of the country—it will be impossible for me, out of that appropriation, to satisfy your request for work in Michigan."

Mr. LEVER. But the gentleman will admit that I quoted Dr. Galloway from the hearings correctly.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I do.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] said a moment ago that there is a vast difference between farm management and farm demonstration. If so, I will ask the gentleman from Michigan if there is anything that will permit the extension of this demonstration work in the North?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. That raises the question that I brought up in the committee, when I questioned Secretary Wilson and Dr. Galloway, the Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry. I learned that under that appropriation to meet the ravages of the boll weevil, thousands of miles away from where the boll weevil is, but in anticipation of its coming, the Bureau of Plant Industry had been teaching the people not how to combat the boll weevil—

Mr. LAMB. Will my friend yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Just a moment. Was teaching the people not how to combat the boll weevil directly, but teaching them diversified agriculture, teaching them to raise corn and potatoes, hogs and cattle, to change their farm work entirely. Really, the bureau has made suggestions to them as to farm management which these gentlemen say is improper under this appropriation. Now, I submit that wonderful work has been done, and I approve it. I am not making any reflection upon it.

Mr. LAMB. I know that my friend and colleague is bound to admit that that comes out of another appropriation, namely, for educational work.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I have only a short time, and I am not making a misstatement. I wish this House to understand that the Department of Agriculture, out of this appropriation for meeting the ravages of the boll weevil, is teaching the people to raise corn and potatoes and stock, and we want to have the same kind of work done in the North.

Mr. LAMB. I ask for a vote, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STONE].

Mr. RAKER. What has become of the substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute is accepted and becomes the amendment. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, let the amendment be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 21, lines 25 and 26, strike out the words "one hundred and eighty-six thousand and twenty dollars" and insert the words "two hundred and fifty-one thousand dollars."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. LAMB. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 83, noes 24.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to hear the result of the vote on the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The ayes are 83 and the noes are 24.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment has not been disposed of yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute of the gentleman from Illinois is accepted by the maker of the original amendment.

Mr. MANN. But he can not accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. He can by unanimous consent. Therefore the question is upon the amendment as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

The Clerk read as follows:

For the investigation and improvement of sugar-producing plants, including their utilization and culture, in the Rio Grande River, $5,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order is reserved.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, the Clerk did not report the amendment correctly, as I wrote it. It is not the "Rio Grande River," but the "Rio Grande Valley." I do not know whether it looks like Rio Grande River or not. I would like to have the Clerk report the amendment again.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the investigation and improvement of sugar-producing plants, including their utilization and culture, in the Rio Grande Valley, $5,000.

Mr. LAMB. I make a point of order on that.

Mr. GARNER. I would like to be heard, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LAMB. I reserve it, then.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, this is exactly the language of a paragraph in lines 18, 19, and 20, on the same page, with the exception of the words "Rio Grande Valley" included.

I am not an expert on the rules of the House or the rules that govern this committee, but if the first paragraph is in accord with the rules of this committee, then it does seem to me that a point of order would not be good as against the paragraph that I have offered. The language is identical, as I say, with the language contained in lines 18, 19, and 20 on the same page, with the exception of the three words "Rio Grande Valley." I have not heard the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture suggest to the Chair upon what he bases his point of order.

Mr. LAMB. I base it upon the ground that it changes the law and makes entirely new conditions.

Mr. GARNER. I can not see the point, Mr. Chairman. The point suggested by the chairman of the committee does not seem to me to be valid.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order made by the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. LAMB. The point of order is that it is not germane to the paragraph, that it is new language, and that it changes the law.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard a moment on the point of order, although I do not know I have any opposition to the amendment.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] assumes that because he uses the same language that is already in the bill, therefore the amendment is not subject to a point of order. But the gentleman does not stop with the language that is in the bill. We have the right to make an appropriation, under the law creating the Department of Agriculture, to include the investigation and improvement of sugar-producing plants or other plants. That law gives the Department of Agriculture and the Secretary of Agriculture the power over the distribution of the funds, the say as to where those funds shall be expended. Under the law creating the department the discretion in reference to the expenditure of the fund, when appropriated, is left in the Secretary of Agriculture.

Now, the gentleman proposes to make an appropriation for a particular territory. That removes the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture and compels him to expend money in a particular section of the country where he would not be required to expend it under his discretionary authority if an appropriation simply be made. It has been held time and again that while an act may authorize Congress to make an appropriation for a particular purpose, to be expended in the discretion of the department, it may not segregate that item and require its expenditure in a particular manner or in a particular place.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me that if the Congress has the right to make an appropriation and leave it to the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture as to where it shall be expended, it also has the right to give a specific direction as to how it shall be expended. If the paragraph I have referred to, contained in lines 18, 19, and 20, is not subject to a point of order and is authorized by law, it occurs to me that the paragraph I have offered as an amendment is also within the terms of the law. If you have a right to appropriate for a general purpose, you certainly have a right to appropriate for and give a special direction as to how that money shall be expended. At least that appears to me to be very good logic.

I understand that the only point made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is that the law authorizes a general appropriation, leaving it entirely discretionary with the Secretary of Agriculture, but that same law does not authorize Congress to make an appropriation and direct how it shall be expended. It does not seem to me that that is good reasoning, and I do not believe it is within good parliamentary practice.

Mr. LAMB. I ask for a ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair is of the opinion that the investigation provided for comes within the authorization of law creating the Department of Agriculture, and is therefore not subject to a point of order on that ground.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes the point more specific in that this amendment confines the investigation to a particular section of the country or a particular line of investigation, and does away with the discretion which the gentleman from Illinois says is by law vested in the Secretary of Agriculture. The Chair is unable to see that that goes to the question of the authority of Congress to make the appropriation. It seems to the Chair that Congress has the power, if it chooses, to limit the investigation to a particular section of the country or a particular line, and that, the general authority being conceded, the special authority must also follow, and that the amendment is not subject to the point of order. The point of order is therefore overruled.

Mr. LAMB. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, if I may have a moment of the time of the committee, I believe the committee will agree with me that in my experience in this House I have not taken up a great deal of the time either of the committee or of the House.

I am intensely interested in this amendment. On last Saturday and to-day I have tried to call attention to the fact that the $30,000 appropriated for this purpose is expended in the Middle West. There is not a dollar of this money expended in experiments with reference to the production of sugar in either Louisiana or Texas, two States that produce the most sugar in the United States. I submit that it is not fair, that it is not right, that you should take the entire appropriation for sugar-producing plants in this agricultural bill and apply that appropriation solely for the purpose of experimenting with the production of sugar in the Middle West. I represent a district where the experimenting in the way of producing sugar plants in the last three years has been something phenomenal. Almost every State in the Union and almost every man on the floor of this House has a former constituent living in the Rio Grande Valley who has purchased a small amount of land there for the purpose of producing sugar or other products. It is nothing but fair and just that some experiments should be made, that some assistance should be given to these small farmers who are undertaking an experiment under new climatic conditions, in a new soil, under an irrigation system that they know nothing about. It is nothing but fair and just that Congress should supplement the fund that the Agricultural College of Texas and the farmers themselves will subscribe in order to test the feasibility, the advisability, and the profit with which they can produce sugar in that valley.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Does the gentleman think that if he gets the $5,000 appropriation to investigate the sugar planting in his district it will square him with his constituents for voting against a free-trade sugar bill that will absolutely kill that industry?

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Colorado is in error. He asks me if I think the appropriation to establish an experimental station in that valley will square me for voting against the free-sugar bill. So far as I have been able to learn, there has been no bill considered by this House to put sugar on the free list. There doubtless will be, and, unlike the gentleman from Colorado, I propose, as one Democrat in the House whose district is interested in the bill to be brought in, to follow my party and vote for the bill. [Applause.] But that does not keep me, Mr. Chairman, from insisting that that district have fair play and a fair opportunity to demonstrate to the country that it can produce sugar in the Rio Grande Valley in competition with the world. I do not know whether they can do it or not; but I do know that this appropriation, together with the appropriation we will get from the Agricultural College of Texas, and the money subscribed by the small farmers, will enable them to determine whether they can produce sugar in that valley in competition with the world.

Mr. YOUNG of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG of Kansas. Is the gentleman willing to vote for an amendment for $5,000 to test the same question in every other valley in the country?

Mr. GARNER. I am willing to vote for an amendment to test it where you have gone in and invested an amount of money that will compare with that invested in the business in the Rio Grande Valley. There has been invested in that valley between $30,000,000 and $40,000,000, and some of the men who invested it came from the gentleman's State. In the last fiscal year they have expended some of this appropriation for the purpose of experimenting in beet sugar in Kansas. Why should the gentleman from Kansas, who has had some of this money expended for the purpose of demonstrating the work in his State, refuse to have the same work done in my State?

Mr. YOUNG of Kansas. I have not objected.

Mr. GARNER. The only States where the money has been expended are Wisconsin, Colorado, Kansas, and Georgia. Why should not the State of Texas, where millions of money have been put into the sugar-producing project—more money than in any other portion of the United States—have this benefit?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up the time of the committee, but I want to impress on the Members of this House the importance of this amendment to the great investments in the Rio Grande Valley. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: "And $5,000 be expended for a similar purpose in the State of Colorado."

Mr. LEVER. I shall offer an amendment that $5,000 be expended in the State of South Carolina for the same purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by adding the words "And $5,000 to be expended for a similar purpose in the State of Colorado."

Mr. MANN. I reserve a point of order to that amendment. I think I will make the point of order first and let it be disposed of. While I think the Chair was entirely in error in ruling on the point of order before, the Chair will readily see the difficulty he has involved the committee in. While I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado is subject to a point of order, because it is not in order to amend one specific proposition by adding another specific proposition, it would be in order if the gentleman offered it as a separate paragraph. I hope every Member in the House who has a district where they produce sugar will take the opportunity to offer a new paragraph, not only in this place, but other places in the bill, so that they may have the chance to discuss the matter before the committee. The Chair having ruled that it is in order for any Member to offer an amendment for the expenditure of money authorized to be expended under the Department of Agriculture at a specific place, there is no limit to the number of amendments which can be offered, because you can offer an amendment to expend money at Gilman and at Oneida or some other place, not even limiting it to the number of districts or the States in the Union. I do not think that when an item is offered for one specific place you can offer an amendment to it for another specific place.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a ruling.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the House is the point of order of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN]. The Chair is prepared to rule. The Chair is still of the opinion that the question of an appropriation containing a specific direction as to its expenditure is a question for the wisdom of the House and not a question involving the authority of the House as a proposition of parliamentary law. It might appear to the wisdom of the House that the investigation of sugar in a certain section of the country was something which required some sort of special appropriation different from that which might be appropriated for some other section of the country. That is a question for the legislative discretion of Congress, and not a question of parliamentary law.

Mr. MANN. But this is not a question of legislative discretion.

The CHAIRMAN. What the Chair endeavored to state was that the question presented was one of legislative discretion, a question the Chair would not pass upon.

But the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado presents a further question, and is subject to a further point of order of not being germane to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas. While any number of provisions might be in order to a general paragraph, it does not at all follow that they are germane to each other. It has been held, as the Chair is advised, that a specific provision by amendment can not be amended by another specific provision; that the one specific provision is not germane to the other specific provision, although each might be germane to the main proposition. Upon that the Chair rules that the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado is subject to the point of order, and the point of order is, therefore, sustained.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas:

And for the investigation, utilization, and cultivation, the sum of $5,000, to be used in the Platt Valley, the headwaters of which are in the State of Colorado.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that offered as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I offer my amendment as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Texas. I think it is in order as a substitute.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that if the gentleman's amendment is not in order as an amendment it could not be in order as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Then I desire to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Texas by striking out the words "Rio Grande Valley" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "State of Colorado."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that if the committee can vote the sum of $5,000 to the Department of Agriculture to make beet-sugar experiments that it can also name the place where the money is to be expended.

Mr. LEVER. Let me suggest to my friend from Colorado if he desires to get this proposition through that he offer his proposition as a separate paragraph, as did the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is the point of order of the gentleman from South Carolina to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado. As the Chair understands the amendment, the gentleman proposes to strike out the words "Rio Grande" and insert in lieu thereof the words "State of Colorado," so that the amendment will then be a specific provision for the State of Colorado. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard in opposition to the amendment. I stood here a moment ago, Mr. Chairman, and with as much power as I possessed fought the proposition of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] to amend this bill, not because of special antagonism to it, but because it was not considered by the committee and not estimated for by the department, and while I have a deep affection for the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] and for the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN], I wish to call the attention of the committee to the situation into which we are getting ourselves in respect to this bill. Whether or not the Chair in its ruling a moment ago be right or wrong, this is a practical proposition against which we are up, if you will permit that kind of an expression. If the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], through his genial personality and his influence on this side of the House, and the other can vote into this bill this amendment, then the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN], equally affable and always entertaining, can vote into it his amendment, and both may be meritorious. Then I offered an amendment jocularly a moment ago that $5,000 should be appropriated for this purpose for South Carolina. We do not grow any sugar-producing stuff in South Carolina except a little old-fashioned sorghum. But the gentleman from Kansas will have the right to offer an amendment for his State; the gentleman from Illinois an amendment for his State; the gentleman from Louisiana an amendment for his State; and my good friend from New York here, Dr. AKIN, an amendment for his State; the gentleman from Illinois, the ex-Speaker of the House, an amendment for his State; and when we get through with this bill, unless we take the bold position here of dealing with this thing regardless of personalities or personal friendship, we will have it loaded down with amendments affecting every district in the United States.

Mr. GARNER. I would like to ask the gentleman in making the comparison to state any instance in the United States where the amount of money expended in the way of the development of the sugar industry of this country equals the Rio Grande Valley; and it is unfair for the gentleman to make that comparison when there is not any point in the United States that is situated as that particular section is.

Mr. MANN. If they are spending so much themselves, they do not need any help.

Mr. LEVER. Let me point out to the gentleman how he places a lot of men in this House with his amendment. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] is interested in this proposition; so is the other gentleman from Colorado, and the gentleman from Louisiana is—

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman will permit for just a second, I desire to say that there are two stations in Colorado now in which this $30,000 is being used. Is the gentleman from Colorado in the same position I am?

Mr. LEVER. Some other gentlemen here are interested along the same line with the gentleman, and the gentleman from Texas puts those gentlemen in the position of absolutely neglecting their own constituents unless they stand here and offer amendments to this bill making appropriations for their own districts and their own people. And let me say another thing. Here is what this bill will do now: In the paragraph on page 21, lines 18 to 20, "for the investigation and improvement of the sugar-producing plants, including their utilization and culture," is authority for the work which the gentleman from Texas wants to be done. It is only a question of whether or not the Department of Agriculture or the administrative branch of the Government regards the work in the district of the gentleman from Texas as of sufficient importance to divert funds to it which they are using in some other sections of the country. Now, gentlemen, that is all I want to say, but I want to impress upon the membership the fact that we are setting a dangerous precedent here which will bob up to bother us throughout the consideration of this bill; and I know my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] well enough to know that if he desires to do it he can hold this House, except through a rule from the Committee on Rules, which we do not want, for the next 30 days on this bill by offering amendments covering propositions involving the districts of Members of the House; and I trust that gentlemen on this side, loving my friend from Texas as they do and as I do, will rise up and vote down this amendment and the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado, that we may put ourselves on record as not being willing that this bill should be loaded down with amendments which have not been considered by the department and which have not been considered by the committee whose duty it is under the rules of this House to consider them. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment—

Mr. GARNER. I want to speak in reference to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado—

Mr. LAMB. What is the necessity, time is passing; we ought to have a vote on this amendment. We have practically voted on it before.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Regular order.

Mr. GARNER. I want to say to the gentleman from Virginia I do not think he is going to gain much time. I have not taken up very much time of this committee.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, my friend had full time this morning and, according to my humble judgment, this whole question was decided this morning. It only comes up in a new form. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment. I do not want to waste any of the time of the House, and I really regret to be put in the position of wantonly defeating the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, and yet there is some merit in my position.

Now, I am glad to hear the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] assert the great importance of the sugar industry in western Texas and, I assume, particularly in his own district. I had not known, I will confess, that it was of such importance. The statistics give the entire State of Texas something like 10,000 tons of sugar production annually, and those figures, as I understand it, include all kinds of sugar in that State—cane as well as beet sugar. And, Mr. Chairman, that is not one-fifth of the quantity of sugar that is produced annually in my congressional district. That is to say, my congressional district alone produces five times as much sugar as the entire State of Texas annually.

Mr. GARNER. May I ask how much sugar is produced in the gentleman's congressional district?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. It produces about 50,000 tons annually.

Mr. GARNER. It does not contain, then, five times as much, for the statistics say that last year there were 18,000 tons produced in the State of Texas, and that was comparatively all produced in the fifteenth congressional district.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I am glad to hear it is more. I am sorry it was not 100,000 tons. If it was that amount, the gentleman would need $15,000 to square himself with his constituents for voting for a free-trade bill. [Applause on the Republican side.] All we ask of Congress is to be given an opportunity to grow sugar. All we ask of Congress is to leave us alone. [Applause on the Republican side.] All we ask of you is not to take us by the throat and throttle us to death. [Applause on the Republican side.] That is all the encouragement we need in that State. Ten years ago there was not a beet-sugar factory in the State of Colorado.

I am not going to launch out here now in these five minutes to make a tariff speech. I am going to discuss this subject some, though, when we get to it. But we have 18 factories in the State of Colorado now. We are the leading beet-sugar producing State in the Union to-day. We produce as much as Michigan, although we have not a third of its population. And yet we have not begun to produce sugar any more than the gentleman's district, or western Texas, has.

We have only 50 or 60 factories in this country, while Europe has 1,500 or 1,600, yet for every acre of land in Europe that will produce sugar beets we have a hundred acres in this country. And gentlemen propose a buncombe political play here in Congress to slaughter that industry, and the gentleman from Texas wants to go back to his congressional district with a little appropriation of $5,000 in his vest pocket in order to square himself with his constituents down there for voting for a bill which, if it could ever find its way onto the statute books of this country, would absolutely and beyond question destroy every sugar factory in it, even if you were to appropriate a million dollars to experiment in sugar plants.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if they need $5,000 in western Texas for the purpose of investigating and experimenting with sugar plants, we need $5,000 in Colorado. They need it in Kansas, Wyoming, Utah, Nevada—

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I insist that this is not the time to discuss the tariff question.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I wanted to impress upon the gentleman from Texas the fact that there might possibly be some merit in my position in offering an amendment here.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I am entitled to be recognized in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado under the rules of the committee as I understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] is recognized.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, as I stated to the committee on last Saturday, I did not want the debate on this amendment, which I think has as much merit in it as any other amendment that has been offered here since I have been a Member of Congress, to go off on the question of a sugar tariff. I believe I have as much interest in the production of sugar, as a Representative in this House, as any other man in it. But, Mr.

Chairman, when I came to this House I came under the Democratic organization. I come here as a Democrat, and whenever my party speaks upon a question of the policy of the party it is my duty to follow that policy. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am not one of those Democrats who, because they do not have their way, are willing to stand on the floor of this House and criticize every other Democrat that does not agree with them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that I will discuss that subject at the proper time. Nobody will make any mistake about where I stand.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] undertook to criticize me for my position in this matter, and undertook to convey the information to the House that I was seeking this appropriation for the purpose of squaring me with my folks at home. If the gentleman will look at the RECORD of last Saturday he will see where the Sugar Cane Growers' Association of the Rio Grande Valley passed a resolution asking me to advocate this amendment long before the Democratic caucus acted on the question of sugar. So I say that the gentleman's insinuation is unjustifiable. It is unworthy of the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I did not mean any unjust reflection upon the gentleman.

Mr. GARNER. I am sure the gentleman did not, but he did not know about this matter. The gentleman, in essence, accuses me of offering a buncombe amendment, as it might be termed, for the purpose of squaring myself with my constituents.

Why, Mr. Chairman, if I were in the position of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN], having two stations in his State now that are supplied with the $30,000 appropriation carried in this bill, I would be the last man to stand on the floor of this House and undertake to say that any other State in the Union that produces sugar as his State does should not have an appropriation, and that the gentleman who offered it offered it as a buncombe amendment and for the purpose of maintaining himself in Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] and his colleagues will come back to Congress, but I want to say to him this, that if my election and reelection to Congress depends upon the fact that I have got to bolt my party every time a question comes up that my State is interested in I will go home and stay there. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, certainly—

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has made a reflection on my colleague, so far as his Democracy goes. Now, let me ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] this question: If the convention which nominated him as a candidate for Congress had instructed him how to vote on this proposition, what would he have done?

Mr. GARNER. If they had given me specific instructions, I would have voted in accordance with the instructions of my constituents. [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. That is exactly what my colleague and I have done.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the chairman of the committee will give me a few minutes in which to address my friend from Texas.

Mr. LEVER. O Mr. Chairman, we can not afford this at all. I ask for a vote.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to think that I will vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], although I am somewhat surprised that the gentleman from Texas reads a lecture to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN]. Why, here is the great Committee on Agriculture, the Democratic members being selected by a caucus and elected by the House, but the gentleman from Texas declines to follow them. He has bolted his party already in offering the amendment. As soon as it comes to him in his district he bolts the party action. He bolts the committee selected by the Democratic caucus and elected by the Democratic House. He is only human, like the rest of us. When it comes to what he wants himself, or what his district wants, rather, he is man enough to stand by his district to the extent of getting an appropriation, at least. [Laughter and applause.] And while he may cast another vote that will veto the effect of the appropriation which he proposes, I do not think it lies in his mouth, while he is offering an amendment to strike down the Committee on Agriculture in charge of the bill, to talk about somebody else's bolting the action of the caucus. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon a vote.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for one minute to address my colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

Mr. LAMB. Then, Mr. Chairman, the colleague from Texas will want time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] asks unanimous consent to speak for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I hope you will confine it strictly to one minute. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I will hold my watch in my hand. [Laughter.]

I want to say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] that, so far as his remarks are concerned with reference to my bolting my party, I am not disturbed on that score at all. I propose, when the proper time comes, to state where I stand, and when I do I can assure the gentleman that my statement will not require any diagram and will not contain any apologies. But, in addition to that, I want to say that personally I very highly esteem the gentleman from Texas—

Mr. MANN. Everybody does—

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. And there is not even a thought in my mind or a feeling in my heart in the way of a reflection on his honesty or his integrity. We have merely indulged in a little passage of the harmless kind that occurs frequently in this House when gentlemen are in a tight hole. And some gentlemen here are in a tight hole; not only those who excused themselves from the caucus, but some that stayed in; and the opening presented could not be very well resisted. I alluded to the sugar bill, not the gentleman's amendment, as buncombe, and I heartily apologize to the gentleman from Texas if there was anything in my remarks that he feels reflected on him. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the yeas seemed to have it.

Mr. GARNER. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—yeas 31, yeas 53.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to come in as a new paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the investigation and improvement of sugar-producing plants, including their utilization and culture in the State of Wyoming, $5,000.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, if there is any question about the point of order, I should like to be heard.

Mr. LAMB. I will waive the point of order and ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] was not adopted. It served a useful purpose, however, during its discussion, as illustrating some of the differences on the other side of the aisle, differences that we on this side of the aisle hope will continue to increase and widen.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], in spite of all temptation to be anything else, proposes to remain a Democrat, and he himself has said it. I do not know that it is to his credit, however, but I imagine that if the gentleman from Texas had had his withers wrung as the gentlemen from Colorado have up to this time in this Congress, he would feel slightly different. The bringing in of the free sugar bill, if that and the other tariff bills that passed the House could become laws, would finally complete the destruction of all the great industries of the Centennial State. Therefore it is not at all remarkable that the gentlemen from Colorado are somewhat disturbed over the past and present program of their party.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I am glad to.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. The gentleman has already stated one difference between the Members from Colorado and the Member from Wyoming. Will he not state also that there is a difference between the States of Colorado and Wyoming, in that Wyoming has not got any land upon which beets can be grown?

Mr. MONDELL. "The gentleman from Wyoming" was not aware that he had been comparing the Members from the State of Colorado and the Member from the State of Wyoming at all.

Evidently the gentleman from Colorado has not been listening to what I have been saying. I have rather been comparing the membership from Colorado with the gentleman from the great State of Texas, who proposes to stay by his party provided he can secure sufficient appropriations. We have, as I said a moment ago, at least a half million acres of land in the State of Wyoming that are first-class beet lands. We produced in our State last year several tens of thousands of tons of beets, some of which contained more than 22 per cent of sugar. Our State stands at the very top in the percentage of saccharine matter contained in her beets. We have the great Shoshone irrigation project on which the Federal Government may eventually spend as much as $6,000,000. Its prosperity depends upon the sugar-beet industry. We have many areas which are producing good crops of beets, and many peculiarly adapted to such production. I am so greatly disinclined to reflect on anyone's motives that I would have hesitated to say what the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] very truthfully, in my opinion, said, that the present program on the other side of the aisle touching sugar is one of pure buncombe; if the gentleman believed they could write on the statute books to-day the free-sugar law they propose, they would hesitate to do it. The gentleman from Colorado has said it is pure buncombe, and the gentleman is a truthful man. I accept his statement.

Mr. LAMB. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The question was taken; and there were on a division (demanded by Mr. MONDELL)—ayes 33, noes 57.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HANNA. I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the study, investigation, and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of grasshoppers and chinch bugs, $20,000.

Mr. LEVER. I reserve a point of order on that amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say but a few words in regard to this proposed amendment. In the States of North and South Dakota, Minnesota, Iowa, and Wisconsin during the last year or two there have been ravages by the grasshopper. Those States have tried to do something in order to check their ravages and also to prevent the increase of the grasshopper. The grasshoppers lay their eggs in the ground; they hatch in the spring and do much damage there. Then, after they arrive at a certain age they are apt to leave and come down in clouds at other points. The States have tried by different methods to get rid of them by plowing the eggs under in the fall and by gathering the young hoppers in the spring and early summer with hopper dozers. They do a very large amount of damage. The State of Minnesota some years ago spent a great deal more money than I am asking for in this amendment for the purpose of destroying the grasshoppers by gathering them, and they paid $1 a bushel for them. They gathered thousands and thousands of bushels, which were gathered with hopper dozers.

If the Government takes up the proposition, as proposed under this amendment, they will endeavor to find a parasite that will destroy these grasshoppers.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANNA. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is not the gentleman's amendment addressed to the Bureau of Entomology rather than that of Plant Industry?

Mr. HANNA. There is a section in that part of the bill relating to this matter—in that part of this bill relating to the Bureau of Entomology—where a certain amount of money is appropriated for protecting cereal and forage crops. The larger part of this money is used to protect alfalfa and forage crops, but not wheat, barley, oats, and corn.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman would not expect the Bureau of Plant Industry to locate a parasite; that is the duty of the Bureau of Entomology.

Mr. HANNA. They might, or they might suggest some other or better method.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANNA. Certainly.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman's amendment is as much in order as the amendment to provide $330,000 to meet the ravages of the cotton-boll weevil. The two are on a par, and one is as much in place as the other.

Mr. MANN. That depends on what is intended.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANNA. Certainly.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Why does not the gentleman insert the word "bedbugs" in his amendment? [Laughter.]

Mr. HANNA. The gentleman may have those pests in his district in New York State, but we do not have them in North Dakota. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Virginia what is his point of order?

Mr. LAMB. That it is entirely new and not germane.

Mr. HANNA. Will not the gentleman let the matter come to a vote one way or the other?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have the amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order and ask for a vote.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I would like to modify the amendment by the insertion of the word "insurgents," so that it will provide against the ravages of grasshoppers, chinch bugs, and insurgents. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey why he does not include flying jinnies and doodles?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting, after line 26, page 21, the following:

"For the investigation and study of methods and testing plants, shrubs, brush, and trees which may be used for rubber making, $3,000."

Mr. LAMB. That is already provided for, and I ask for a vote.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman in what part of the bill it is provided for? We have been trying to get this investigation for years.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to my friend from California that the Department of Agriculture, without specific authority, acting under general appropriation and general authority, is now doing a great deal of experimental work in Florida in relation to the production of rubber, camphor, and so forth. I am sure that if the gentleman will get in touch with the department he will find out how much money is being expended and in what direction.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman tell me how to get in touch with the department?

Mr. LEVER. Go there and see them.

Mr. RAKER. But suppose I am in touch and have been in touch, but am informed that there is no money and no provision. It is pretty hard to get in touch with the department when there is no money on hand for use for the purpose desired. They can not help you then.

Mr. LAMB. I think my friend is mistaken; there is no sectionalism down there.

Mr. MANN. The Botanical Garden is engaged in sending out rubber plants.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman has not heard from me yet on this proposition. My purpose is not to send out rubber plants; it is not to produce plants; but it is the question of producing material and a method that can be had to supply the American market with rubber. It has been under private investigation in the West with some degree of success. It is thought that out of sagebrush the best rubber on earth can be made. We have asked the department to help us; individuals have gone into it and have given all the consideration to it they could, but they have not the money.

We would like to have tested the plants now in existence, the shrubbery that is being destroyed and burned. It is claimed that there is a large percentage of rubber in them which ought to be utilized, and it ought to be tested. It ought to be made commercial instead of being destroyed. If the department, by virtue of its experience in this matter, can send a couple of men into the West to make these investigations, is it not right, is it not proper, and ought not they to do it? I know that the committee is in favor of giving every advantage to improve the country and to get the value out of every product, every plant, tree, and shrub and brush that we have. Let us get that experience which there is in the department; let us get this matter determined.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Some gentleman sent me a statement the other day in reference to some report, or something of the kind, about extracting rubber from milkweed that grows wild and in great profusion. Will the gentleman's amendment cover an investigation of that, and can the gentleman state whether or not the Department of Agriculture has ever made any investigation of that product?

Mr. RAKER. The investigation would cover that. It would cover, also, the question of the investigation of sagebrush. Some people have given a good deal of study and thought to the matter, and at one time, a few years ago, it was determined to build a factory. They felt as if they had the process completed, but also felt, because they had not enough knowledge in regard to the matter, that they were not warranted in going on with the enterprise.

These people believed that there is material in sagebrush that can be extracted from it which will make as good rubber as is being used to-day. There are millions of acres of land with sagebrush upon it. Instead of destroying that, if it produces a material that will make rubber, ought not we to investigate the matter? Nothing will live upon that land now. No one knows any good that it will ever do. Why not find out what is in the sagebrush and other plants of that kind. You are spending money for every other condition. You are seeking to add new plants, and the very things that you have in the ground you are destroying and burning up, and you are not trying to find out if there is anything in them that is good. I am in favor of all of the new matters, but I believe we ought to utilize what we have. The people in these departments are very anxious and ready to do this. Let them go there. They can send two good men out there to make this investigation. I hope with an industry as great as the rubber industry involved, that the committee will be willing to stand by the amendment and spend at least $3,000 to have the matter investigated. This is a territory that covers over 20,000,000 acres of land, and if it has a growth now upon it, which at present is of no value, so far as we now know, but might produce good rubber, we ought to know it. Give the department the chance to experiment. They have done great things, are doing it now, and will continue to do it if they are properly encouraged and the funds are provided therefor. We should make that provision, appropriate the necessary funds, and the department will do the work. I hope the amendment offered by me will prevail.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, the department did not ask for this, as active as is the Bureau of Plant Industry. If there was anything in this business they would have developed it. Dr. Galloway says that the Orient is the place for this work, and he thought the people of this country would better apply themselves to some other subject than the development of this matter. I sincerely hope that the Committee of the Whole will stand by the Committee on Agriculture and vote down the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton-boll weevil, $332,960.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of getting some information from the chairman of the committee. I see in this present appropriation there has been a cut from last year of about $18,000.

Mr. LAMB. Seventeen thousand and forty dollars.

Mr. TRIBBLE. What was the purpose of that cut?

Mr. LAMB. Of that amount $9,560 covers the transfer of nine employees to the statutory roll, $480 has been transferred to the appropriation for western agricultural extension, and $7,000 covers an item for rent which has been transferred to the special appropriation for that purpose, so that there is practically no reduction.

Mr. TRIBBLE. And the gentleman can state there is no reduction in this section of the appropriation so far as it is applicable to the boll weevil?

Mr. LAMB. That is correct.

Mr. TRIBBLE. This House voted Saturday last not to reduce the boll-weevil section of the bill. On this statement of the chairman I will not introduce this amendment which I prepared to restore the amount.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the investigation and improvement of methods of crop production under semiarid or dry-land conditions, $70,000.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, line 5, strike out the word "seventy" and insert in lieu thereof the word "ninety."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, this relates to the earlier investigation and improvement of methods of crop production in arid and semiarid farming. I have received petition after petition—have sent letters to the department in regard to this matter. They say they are ready, they are willing, to give their assistance if they can to improve the methods of dry farming and assist the farmer, but that at the present time they have no money with which they can extend their present operations. Now, I want to read the testimony in hearings, on page 74, given by Dr. Galloway.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Doctor, "for the investigation and improvement of methods of production under semiarid or dry-land conditions, $70,000." This is the same as you had last year. Could you do with a slight reduction here?

Why, of course the doctor is going to say, "We will do the best we can." No doubt of that.

Mr. LAMB. He did not say that.

Mr. RAKER. Here is what he said.

Mr. LAMB. Give us what he said.

Mr. RAKER. I will read you what he said in regard to the matter:

Dr. GALLOWAY. I think not.

So he said he did not think he could get along with that.

Mr. LAMB. The gentleman has got the wrong construction there.

Mr. RAKER. Let me read this sentence.

Mr. LAMB. Read it without commenting, please.

Mr. RAKER. I always read all when I start to read it, if I have the opportunity.

Mr. LAMB. But you stop to preach after you read a sentence.

Mr. RAKER. I will read it when I get an opportunity, if the gentleman will not interrupt too long.

Mr. LAMB. Read.

Mr. RAKER. I will read it when I get in a position to start.

Mr. LAMB. Your time is passing.

Mr. RAKER. I know I am losing my time, but can not help it.

Dr. GALLOWAY. I think not, Mr. Chairman, because the demand for information from the arid districts is growing greater each year. The farmers are crowding into that country, and this work we are carrying on out there has for its object the securing of fundamental facts and the discovery of principles which will apply to dry-farming methods. Dry farming is of a different type from anything we are familiar with in the East, and what we are doing on the stations we have established is the working out of principles through crop rotations and through experiments. It is largely investigational, having for its objects the discovery of principles which will apply to dry-land conditions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have two minutes more.

Mr. RUBEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes, and that two minutes of that time be given to the gentleman from California and the balance to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman be given five minutes.

Mr. MANN. We want some time over here on this side of the House.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I amend the suggestion of my colleague of the committee, and I ask that all debate on this paragraph and amendments close in 10 minutes, the time to be equally divided between the two sides.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia moves that all debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in 10 minutes, the time to be equally divided between the two sides.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture that I am interested in this, coming from the West and knowing the conditions in many of the Western States.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman seems to have given this subject a great deal of thought and consideration, and I would like to ask him this question, Does the gentleman believe that dry farming can be made a success?

Mr. RAKER. Oh, absolutely.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. There is no question about that.

A MEMBER. None in the world.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the chairman of the committee I am new here, I am inexperienced and green, but I am interested in this matter in presenting it to the committee for consideration. I did it without any disrespect to him—

Mr. LAMB. I understand that.

Mr. RAKER. But when you have facts, when you have spent 34 years in the Western States traveling over that country and in most of them seeing what is being done and seen what can be done, I want to say that you will not stand idly here when you believe you can get legislation and an appropriation that will advance the farmer.

Mr. LAMB. But I insist that the gentleman ought to have come before the committee and seen the department about these matters. The gentleman coming here at this late day can not expect this committee to reverse the action of the Committee on Agriculture in reference to these matters.

Mr. RAKER. I am giving you here what the department had said and what the department had recommended—

Mr. LAMB. We gave whatever the Agricultural Department asked.

Mr. RAKER. It is no breach of faith to come in when the only way to bring the matter up is to get it here.

A crop that could not be produced upon these lands four and five and six years ago can be produced now by virtue of what information these people have received. I want to say to you to-day that five or six years ago there was land that could be bought for $5 an acre, that by virtue of the knowledge that people have received as to raising alfalfa you could not buy to-day for $200 an acre, and because it raises a crop that is worth that amount. And it is by virtue of the knowledge, it is by virtue of the information, it is by virtue of the tillage of the soil, and the virtue of the time of cutting the crop and handling it that we are able to get this result. And wherever you can extend this information to farmers in the Western States, which cover such a large territory of the country, it should be done. It is entirely different from the South. For six or seven months we never have one drop of rain. It is all dependent on the method and mode of cultivation of the kind of plants to be handled and the time of planting them. And I believe there is no appropriation of any amount in this bill that will do more good to build up 130,000,000 acres of land that belongs to the Government at this time.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I would like to ask the gentleman if the agricultural college of California has made any investigations as to what may be done in this dry farming, and if it is now carrying on any investigation?

Mr. RAKER. They are doing worlds of work and of vast value to the State, not only as to irrigated lands but lands that are not irrigated. They are sending demonstration trains all over California and spending large sums of money. They are also sending men out to farmers' institutes. But if the Government could cooperate with them, with the knowledge it has and the information it has gathered, we will receive just that much more information, that much more knowledge, and add more value to the West.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I agree with the gentleman. If dry farming can be made a success, very well; we can well afford to appropriate money for that purpose. But if it can not be made a success, Congress is doing an injustice to those people who are moving into that country. We have been encouraging these people here to settle in arid and semiarid lands, and what has happened? Nothing but starvation stares them in the face. Are we going to appropriate hundreds of thousands of dollars here to encourage people to settle on these lands where there is nothing in store for them but the poorhouse? I may be mistaken, but, as I understand it, my friends, dry farming can not be made a success. Crops can not be grown without the moisture, and, without it, this appropriation is of no avail.

Mr. RAKER. Does the gentleman realize that about 30 years ago we first commenced to develop alfalfa in and about Reno? For 15 years in the northern counties they tried to make a success on this land where they had no irrigation and they could not get a bit of alfalfa, but, by virtue of experience since, they are getting to-day off of the same land that 10 or 15 years ago was worthless from 3 to 6 tons of alfalfa an acre every year, worth from $7 to $10 a ton, by dry farming.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. RAKER. I was hoping to get some time to discuss this amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. I would like to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. MANN. How much time remains, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. There are three minutes remaining of the time allotted by the House

Mr. MANN. The Chair did not call down the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], who had the floor. The Chair has not recognized anyone since.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California concluded his remarks and the Chair recognized the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Iowa did not take the floor. He only asked a question in the time of the gentleman from California. We had a distinct understanding with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] that the gentleman from Wyoming was to have five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] he may have five minutes.

Mr. HAUGEN. I think I can make that clear. I asked that I be recognized. I understood the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] desired time, and I understood that I would only take two minutes; and if I have, I do not care to take up any more time. But if I may have time, I would like to answer the question propounded by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I desire to offer an amendment to this amendment, Mr. Chairman, and I ask three minutes in which to discuss it after the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is through.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] has the floor. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Iowa if he had concluded his remarks?

Mr. HAUGEN. I wish to proceed. I would like to answer the gentleman from California. He has pointed out the wonderful results that have been accomplished through this dry farming. I want to answer him by saying I remember that appeal came up from "bleeding Kansas" a few years ago. I happened to be in one of the northwestern States last year, and I saw those people coming from that arid district in South Dakota, to which they went by the hundreds. They were out there engaged in dry farming. An appeal was made similar to that of "bleeding Kansas" a few years ago; and I believe that until we can ascertain and know that this money, when appropriated, can be judiciously expended and with some results, we should go a little slow in making appropriations for this work. That is all I have to say.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed five minutes, as I yielded my time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] asks unanimous consent to speak for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, when I was a boy of 6 I moved West, with the family that had kindly given me a home, to northwestern Iowa. At that time a great many people were of the opinion that it would be impossible to conduct general farming operations successfully in that country. We suffered from drought; we suffered from too much rain; and for five years the grasshoppers, which my friend from North Dakota has been so eloquent in describing, destroyed the major portion of our crops. Of course those were hard times.

We have followed the development of the West to the summit of the Rocky Mountains since that time and on to the Pacific. I have seen the fluctuation of settlement back and forth. The tide of emigration pressed westward. The coming of years of drought temporarily drove the border settlements back. With the return of increased rainfall the settler again pressed forward. In each one of these forward movements something has been gained, the line of permanent settlement has always been placed a little farther west with each recurring movement of western settlements, until they have now reached the great plains of the Rockies and are confronting there the conditions that my friend has referred to as existing in California.

For the past two years; aye, for the past three years, we have been passing through a period of unusual drought, a period of less rainfall than the average for 20 years past. The result is that doubting Thomases, like my good friend from the State of Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN], comfortable and content in the rich territory in which they live, and not having the incentive to the development of the new territory that we have who live in it, would rather discourage than encourage the men who are now making the last final assault to conquer the American Desert.

It is true that the new settlers have suffered grievously. In the region that I live in are many farmers who have not raised any crops at all for two years. The remarkable thing about it is that those men are still hopeful—ininitely more hopeful than my friend from Iowa—and while they are suffering, they are still courageous. They know that if the conditions of the last three years were to continue there would be no grass in that territory, to say nothing of there being no crops, and that the range industry would perish in that territory. But they know that the last two years have been extraordinary and unusual, and they know that while they may have to meet similar conditions occasionally in the future, yet if they could have the rainfall that we have had on the average for the last 20 years there are certain classes of crops which, with careful and thorough cultivation, can be produced at a profit. Men will not grow rich on those dry lands; but many thousands of comfortable homes will be established upon them, and to-day that territory has the most hopeful outlook for the average American settler. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, the department asked for no more. We gave the department their estimate.

Mr. MANN. The debate is closed. Does the gentleman from Virginia desire some time?

Mr. LAMB. I ask for a vote.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, can I now offer my amendment to the pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado can send his amendment to the Clerk's desk, but the debate on the paragraph is closed.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. My amendment is to strike out the word "ninety" and insert the words "one hundred." Now, Mr. Chairman, I want three minutes in which to discuss this proposition; only three minutes. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. MANN. Let the gentleman ask for three minutes.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: Strike out the word "seventy" in line 5, page 22, and insert in lieu thereof the word "ninety."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER] desire to offer an amendment to that amendment?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California: Strike out the word "ninety" and insert in lieu thereof the words "one hundred."

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes in which to discuss my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to discuss his amendment for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry to see that my friend from California [Mr. RAKER] does not quite understand this proposition. I have been engaged for the last 30 years in what is known as dry farming or soil cultivation. It is not quite true that you can raise crops in this arid country by soil cultivation or otherwise unless you have some precipitation. It is absolutely necessary that there shall be precipitation and it is absolutely necessary for the farmer to know what to do with that precipitation. In the first place, he must have his ground thoroughly plowed, and he must be educated how to plow it and how deep to plow it, depending on the kind of soil he has to cultivate. Then immediately after the rainfall, as soon as the harrow will not stick in the ground, he must go over his field as quickly as possible, making a mulch over the field, thereby storing up the precipitation in the ground. The moment this pulverization is made the capillary attraction ceases, and you have stored in the ground a reservoir into which the plants put in the ground may afterwards send down their roots and get nourishment. It is true, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] says, that time and again people have gone there and have had to go away. I said a few minutes ago, with respect to another amendment I offered, that it is true that probably after 5 or 6 or sometimes 10 years people have broken down in heart and left that country, but it does not follow that they will continue to do so. If this appropriation is made and if more light is thrown upon the question of soil culture, then, in my judgment, dry farming, as it is called, or what is more properly known as the Campbell system, will prove an entire success over that vast arid region.

Mr. LAMB. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER] to the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The question being taken, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. RAKER, on a division (demanded by Mr. RAKER), there were—ayes 27, noes 50.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For studying methods of clearing off "logged-off" lands with a view to their utilization for agricultural and dairying purposes; for their irrigation; for testing powders in clearing them; and for the utilization of by-products arising in the process of clearing, in cooperation with States, companies, or individuals, or otherwise, $5,000.

Mr. MANN. I reserve a point of order on that paragraph.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, this is new language in the bill, and I am sure gentlemen would like to hear a new voice on this subject.

Mr. MANN. Does the Chair understand that a point of order is reserved?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that a point of order is reserved.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this paragraph is to enable the department to study the problem of the clearing up and utilization of the logged-off lands in the West. In some parts of the country from which I come large areas have been logged over, leaving the large stumps, the tops of the trees, and the trees that could not be used for making lumber. These lands had once a very heavy growth of timber, and the stumps generally are very large and numerous. The soil is very rich. Various endeavors have been made by individuals and private companies to clean off the land at a cost that would justify it. Owners of considerable areas have offered to sell the lands to private parties. Some have succeeded with the clearing process and others have not. In some parts of the West private companies have been organized, cooperative and otherwise, which have taken over the logged-off lands, and they are endeavoring to clear them off for purposes of cultivation. There are tens of thousands of acres of these lands. Various questions arise in the clearing of the land. Various methods have been tried, like the using of a steam donkey, collecting the logs in great piles around snags, but that method is too expensive for the ordinary man. He can not afford the expense. But the department has devised methods, like that of char pitting stumps, as well as other methods for clearing off the land at lessened expense.

The object of this appropriation is to extend these experiments further and to teach the owners of the land and those who may be willing to cooperate with the Government in the matter the best and least expensive methods for clearing them off. Also to communicate to the settlers the knowledge that the Government has acquired by actual demonstration work, as is done in the South in the boll-weevil work, and various other experimental works carried on by the Government.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Has the gentleman investigated the matter in the department to find out whether they have made any study of this subject?

Mr. HAWLEY. I have not investigated especially this particular question, but I have some other matters and know that they are investigating to some extent the matters provided for in this paragraph.

Mr. RAKER. But at the present time the department has made no investigation?

Mr. HAWLEY. On char pitting, yes. But the general subject has not been very thoroughly gone into.

Mr. RAKER. I am talking about getting rid of the stumps by powder.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know to what extent they have experimented with powder.

Mr. RAKER. That is an important factor in this matter. Would the gentleman have any objection to putting in after the word "agriculture" the words "horticulture and viticulture," and after the word "testing" the words "the use of," so as to read: "Testing the use of powder," and so forth?

Mr. HAWLEY. I have no objection to that.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not a fact that in the West with the new kinds of powder it is beginning to be realized that you can get a great benefit out of these lands very cheaply if proper testing is made for the purpose of clearing the land?

Mr. HAWLEY. I have no doubt that methods can be devised by which the lands can be cleared off at a low cost.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Outside of cleared land, not covered with timber, the lands that have been used for agriculture in the West are logged-off lands?

Mr. HAWLEY. I should think that would be a safe proposition, if I understand the gentleman correctly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman does not believe in helping these speculative land companies that bought the land cheaply; there is no especial reason why the Government at this late day should go into such an enterprise as this?

Mr. HAWLEY. The problem on these lands is different from that on lands where the growth was small, and, of course, the stumps much smaller and more easily taken out.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; it is a bigger question; it depends on the size of the stump. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAWLEY. There are no speculative companies that I know of. The States, I think, will assist in this matter; but there are hundreds and thousands of acres of this land, as rich as any land we have. I know of some land that is worth $500 an acre after it was cleared off, but, as I say, the cost of the clearing of these lands is prohibitive, generally, under present methods.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. How is it proposed that this money shall be used; what is the project?

Mr. HAWLEY. It will depend upon the discretion of the department.

Mr. MANN. What is the proposition of the department in reference to it? This appropriation is only $5,000, and it can not be scattered over the universe. What do they propose to do with it?

Mr. HAWLEY. They will probably take a section in Washington, for instance, that is logged off and show the settlers how to char pit the stumps and to remove them; how to take out the stumps so that, for illustration, ship's knees may be made where the roots are long enough, and how to use other by-products, such as the timber that is left on the land suitable for paper making or for other purposes, and ascertain what other valuable products may be obtained. Information obtained in one place would be available for use in any part of the United States.

[The time of Mr. HAWLEY having expired, at the request of Mr. MANN it was extended five minutes.]

Mr. MANN. Do I understand that it is a part of the project to ascertain whether the stumps are suitable for making paper?

Mr. HAWLEY. No; there is a second growth on a good deal of the land.

Mr. MANN. And you want to cut off the second growth and see whether it is available for paper making?

Mr. HAWLEY. The second growth on some of this land is 100 feet high; it grows very rapidly.

Mr. MANN. But they do not need $5,000 to know how to cut these trees down.

Mr. HAWLEY. I was not laying so much emphasis on that as I was on the removal of the stumps and the other purposes I have mentioned. On the place in Washington I used for illustration they use the long roots of the stumps for ships' knees.

Mr. MANN. I think we are entitled to know something about this. Here is a proposition for $5,000, which, if it amounts to anything at all, will soon be $50,000 or $100,000. I think we ought to know what the project is and what it is intended to do.

Mr. HAWLEY. The purpose is to enable the department to go upon logged-off lands, examine and ascertain the cheapest methods of clearing them off, especially where they have very large stumps; to see what profit can be derived by the settlers while clearing out the stumps; and to teach the settlers how to char pit the stumps where that is possible; to teach them in the use of powder economically, what kind of powder can be used, and when and where it can be best used; and to aid in solving all the other problems that the settler will be confronted with in clearing such land. Sometimes the old logs are three deep, and where the ground is somewhat soft the lower one is buried almost entirely in the ground.

Mr. MANN. But all you can do with this money is to hire one man and to pay his expenses. What is the man going to do? He can not do these things that the gentleman has been telling about on $5,000. You can hire only one man to do this at that sum.

Mr. HAWLEY. The department can study the problem and determine the best and least expensive methods for the clearing off of these logged-off lands.

Mr. MANN. Here is a proposition to have the department study the subject of irrigation. The department has nothing to do with that subject and ought not to have. We have another branch of the Government studying irrigation. Then there is a provision for testing powders. Why, people have been testing powders, blowing up stumps, ever since we have had powder. Then there is a provision for the utilization of by-products arising in the process of clearing, in cooperation with States, companies, or individuals; that is, to have the Government go into partnership with some individual or company.

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman is in error there. One company has agreed to contribute to the Government a sum of money to assist in carrying on this investigation. They are willing to make a donation.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman said something about the use of the by-product for making paper. My particular interest in that proposition is that the gentleman's committee has reduced the amount for experimentation in reference to the use of wood in the manufacture of paper.

They now have at Madison, Wis., a wood laboratory that is making valuable search and research in connection with some of the paper mills in regard to the subject of using different kinds of timber for the production of ground wood pulp. The committee reduces the appropriation for that, where it can be useful, and they stick in a $5,000 appropriation here where the man who uses it will not know any more about paper than a mule does about heaven. I object to cutting off the appropriation where it can do good and putting it in where it can not do any good.

Mr. HAWLEY. If the gentleman will permit, no greater good can be done to the lands west of the Cascade Mountains—and I speak of those because I am more acquainted with them than with other lands—than for the Government to ascertain the most effective and cheapest methods of clearing up these lands and to teach such methods to the settlers by demonstration and otherwise. There are hundreds of thousands of acres of these lands, which are as fertile as any we have.

Mr. MANN. Is that not also true of Wisconsin and Michigan?

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a ruling on the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order upon the ground that it is not authorized by law and consequently that it is legislation. There is no authorization in law for the work that is proposed to be done under this paragraph. There is nothing in the act creating the Department of Agriculture that authorizes the expenditure of public money in cooperation with States and individuals and private companies. It is clearly legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman contend that the general purpose of the clearing of logged-off land for agricultural purposes has not been the existing law?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, it is clearly legislation to cooperate with States and companies and with private individuals.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the general purpose of preparing logged-off lands for agriculture and studying methods of doing that would not be subject to a point of order, but that the provision for the cooperation with States, companies, or individuals would be new legislation. The point of order to the entire paragraph is therefore sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigations in connection with the utilization of lands reclaimed under the reclamation act, and other areas in the arid and semiarid regions, $69,600.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking unanimous consent that the Delegate from Porto Rico [Mr. RIVERA] may extend his remarks in the Record upon the bill which was passed yesterday giving citizenship to the people of Porto Rico. He was unavoidably detained from the House at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the Delegate from Porto Rico may be permitted to extend his remarks in the Record as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RIVERA. Mr. Chairman, it is my duty, on expressing the opinions and the aspirations of the people of Porto Rico, whose interests and sentiments I represent in this House, to applaud and to support the bill now under consideration. I must declare that the majority, the large majority, of Porto Ricans are sincerely attached to the American Nation. And I must also declare that, should American citizenship be bestowed upon them, my countrymen will always feel grateful to the American Representatives who through their action would give them a proof of confidence in their loyalty, and that they would enthusiastically, bravely, and proudly uphold their citizenship, identifying themselves with the new country to which their historic destiny has united them, loving and respecting the flag that protects their homes, doing honor by their civic conduct to the national family that receives them, and, finally, endeavoring to be the worthy sons of the America of Washington and Lincoln, not only because of their political condition but also because so impelled by the natural feelings of their souls, jaded and mortified up to the present time by indifference and injustice.

But it is also my duty, Mr. Chairman, to remark in addition, in plain and simple words, that Porto Ricans would not feel satisfied with American citizenship if American justice is not done them; if they are not granted full American rights, void of any qualifications that would mean inferiority to them. Originating from a race that, like your own, holds dignity dearer than life, the Porto Ricans will feel humiliated until you have abolished in the island a colonial system, under which the government is not founded upon the will of the governed and by which taxes are imposed without representation of those who are taxed. The executive council, a body that makes and executes the laws simultaneously and that alone fixes the salaries of public officials, is not elected by the people, its members being appointed by the Federal Executive power. And to you, gentlemen, I consider I need say nothing else in order that you may realize that no democracy, fashioned after American style, has been established in Porto Rico, and that our present form of government resembles more that of an autocracy of monarchical type. The principles founded by your Constitution do not reach the far-off possession on the bosom of the Caribbean Sea, extending not beyond Long Island and drowning in the deep waters of the Atlantic Ocean under the weight of bureaucratic ambitions.

We never were, nor are we now, radical in our demands for reform. The Filipinos are struggling for absolute independence; the Porto Ricans are contending for self-government, which they are longing to exercise and which they would know how to practice under the shadow of republican institutions. Should you consider us worthy of your citizenship, you should not deem us unworthy of the administration of our affairs, allowing us to make and enforce our own laws. I do not doubt that the grant of citizenship would open, in a frank and friendly manner, an era of fraternity between the Americans of Porto Rico and the Americans of the continent, an era of liberty—absolute liberty—of autonomy—complete autonomy—for the Americans of Porto Rico.

And permit me, gentlemen, to assert that, when I express this profound conviction of my soul, I base myself on your practical sense of political realities. You have at the south of your great Nation 20 Republics closely looking upon the one at the north, alert as to your actions, in order to manifest their kindly feelings or to restrain them.

The providential mission of the United States in America will not be fulfilled until there irradiates from this Capitol an effective and powerful influence that may secure to the United States the amplest moral and commercial hegemony from the Great Lakes to the Strait of Magellan. Your future development requires that your influences extend to such a range, for the commerce and industries of the United States will demand such a vast market. By enacting the independence of Cuba you gave an admirable example of generosity and altruism; she is free and happy because you made her so. Let it be added to the gratefulness of the Cubans, the gratitude of the Porto Ricans, who you can make happy and free as well as under your sovereignty. Then you would prove that you still are what you always were in the past—a people entitled to God's favors, not for their power, which is great, but for their devotion to the principles that helped them to conquer their independence and to maintain and to increase their prestige throughout the world.

The Porto Ricans, as all men on earth, love national independence. To all solutions they prefer that which would make them an independent and sovereign nation. But they are an intelligent people; they are thoroughly acquainted with the obstacles that would bar the success of their paramount ideal. Actuated by their patriotism, they are at present moved to fight for practical reforms that may allow them to insure their predominance in the affairs of their country. Besides, we have faith in the American people solving our insular problem promptly and generously. But do not let this faith be lost lest all Porto Ricans would ask you to do by them as you did by the Cubans, under identical conditions, that the island be delivered to her sons.

I do not consider this the proper time to discuss the grounds upon which the people of Porto Rico base their right to self-government. That opportunity will come later on. I rise to speak in this House for the first time, and I feel that I ought to mention that which is most longed for by my country and that which would be the source of the greatest advantage to yours. What suits you is not incompatible with that which we desire. These ideas are in perfect harmony with each other; they stand for solutions that coincide in mutual benefit, because they will allow you, first, to be consistent with your principles and history, and secondly, to gain for yourselves the confidence of the Latin-American countries. This is the only means, gentlemen, through which you will be able to widen, upon an equitable basis, the power of your country, which will be our country when you open us your doors to enter and when you have introduced in our cities and in our villages your American democracy.

Do not forget, gentlemen, that such is our right and that such is your duty.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after the word "of," at the end of line 13, page 22, the following words: "and for studying methods of clearing off," and strike out the word "reclaimed" in line 14, page 22.

Mr. MANN and Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee to the uselessness of spending money for the purpose as it now appears in the bill. I want to read it as it stands now:

For investigations in connection with the utilization of lands reclaimed under the reclamation act.

Now, let us stop right there. Lands reclaimed means lands grubbed, plowed, ditched, and irrigated.

Mr. MANN. That does not make any difference; there is more trouble after the land is irrigated than anything else.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, let us see for a moment. That is done for the purpose of giving a man the benefit, for the purpose of putting him in a condition where he shall not expend his money uselessly; that he will not grub up poor land first and put ditches where they ought not to be and cut down knolls and hills from his land. If you strike out the word "reclaimed," then you have investigations in connection with the utilization of lands under the reclamation act. If you put it before he has made his reclamation, you will spend your money to show him how to clear it, how to ditch it, how to level it, and how to put it in shape, and when he gets his water on it he will have the ditches, he will have it plowed, he will have it leveled, and in proper shape, but now you say that you investigate the land after he has leveled it, after he has plowed it and ditched it and put water on it. Why not make this investigation of the land under the reclamation project?

Mr. LAMB. Now, my mind ran pretty much in the line of the gentleman, and I asked this question:

The CHAIRMAN. The next paragraph seems to relate to nearly the same thing. "For investigations in connection with the utilization of lands reclaimed under the reclamation act, $69,600."

Dr. GALLOWAY. We are familiar with the fact that the Reclamation Service is spending a good many millions of dollars in putting water on certain of their large projects. This problem is an engineering one, and when the water is on important agricultural problems arise. Now they call upon us to help them in the agricultural work, and we have established on these reclamation projects stations where we are conducting investigations to aid and guide the settlers who come in and take up this land and use water. In the item above we deal with dry farming; in this item it is an irrigated farm.

Mr. RAKER. That is the point. Let me call the Chairman's attention to it. A man goes and plows on 160 acres of this land, or 80 acres of it, and he starts in to improve it. Is it not better for him to receive the advantage of how that should be cleared, how it should be leveled, how it should be ditched, than to wait until he has spent all his money and then tell him how he ought to have done it? Let them give him the information in the first instance. That is what I am seeking, and I am satisfied that the department will be more than ready and anxious to give that assistance if we strike out the word "reclaimed" and leave it "lands under the reclamation project."

Mr. LAMB. Now, here is another of the same questions I asked before of my friend. The gentleman should have gone and consulted Dr. Galloway, and if in his judgment that would have answered the purpose better than the other and meet the gentleman's wishes, he would have done it, very likely—I do not say positively—but the gentleman comes here now and asks us to make this change in language which we are not prepared to say is the best language or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAMB. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his point of order?

Mr. LAMB. I withdraw the point of order and ask for a vote.

Mr. MANN. As I understand the point of order, it is that the gentleman proposes to put another proposition in the paragraph.

Mr. LAMB. That is what I claim, and I do not think the committee will stand for it.

Mr. RAKER. I want to make this suggestion to the gentleman from Illinois, that all land that is subject to irrigation or reclamation under the reclamation project must, if the law is carried out, eventually be reclaimed. Reclamation means irrigation.

Mr. MANN. Suppose it is reclaimed. This is a question of utilizing the land reclaimed, and the moment it is reclaimed it is like land in the gentleman's State or my State; it is plowed up and it is under cultivation.

The question comes as to how is the best way to utilize it, and out there they need them to meet these problems at once that are not met anywhere else. With alkali lands various propositions come up as to what can be raised on the soil under irrigation. It is just as important to study that as it is to study the use of the soil anywhere else. It has to be utilized. People go out under the impression that they can go on a piece of irrigated land—an impression gained through the advertisements that they get—and turn the water on and off as they please, and raise such crops as they please. There is nothing further from the truth.

Mr. RAKER. Will not the gentleman from Illinois yield to a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. Is not the very purpose of the Government's reclamation project that of putting every acre of land that is included in the project of irrigation under actual cultivation and irrigation?

Mr. MANN. Assume that that is the case, then what?

Mr. RAKER. Now, the question is, Ought not these men that file upon this land before it is plowed and cultivated and irrigated to have the information of how to get that land in shape and what they could use it for? They could test it just as well before it is plowed and irrigated, and even better, than afterwards.

Mr. MANN. That is where the gentleman is mistaken. There is not an irrigation project in the United States where they can tell in advance of irrigating the land just what conditions they will meet after the land is irrigated and cultivated.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, yes; by examination of the soil and analysis of the water—

Mr. MANN. My information comes from scientific gentlemen who tell me that, but I do not know whether they are correct or not.

Mr. RAKER. My information is from the University of California as to the soil, and atmosphere, and water, and you can not get any better information than that.

Mr. MANN. We are just beginning to discover that it is not a simple problem.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the ground of the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. LAMB. I make a point of order against it—

Mr. MANN. I thought the gentleman withdrew the point of order and asked for a vote on it.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the ground of the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. LAMB. I waived the point of order and asked for a vote.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman proposes to strike out the word "reclaim" and make this apply to the reclamation act, not merely the utilization of land. But I forget what the expression was which was used by the gentleman.

Mr. RAKER. "For investigations in connection with the utilization of land under the reclamation act." Now, that includes every acre.

Mr. MANN. That was not what the gentleman had in his amendment.

Mr. RAKER. I had first "the methods of reclamation and studying methods of clearing off lands under the reclamation act."

Mr. MANN. Which is the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. RAKER. To include after the word "of," in line 13, "studying methods of clearing off," and striking out the word "reclaim," in line 14.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I insist that is subject to a point of order. That would read, "for the studying of methods for clearing off land under the reclamation act." Is that what the gentleman means? Does he mean lands under the reclamation act?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; all lands that may be under the reclamation act.

Mr. MANN. There is no provision under the reclamation act for that. The question of studying lands under the reclamation act would be for studying lands in accordance with the reclamation act.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. That is what it means.

Mr. RAKER. The only question is that you let them study the land after it is reclaimed instead of studying it before it is reclaimed. That is all there is to it.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman means the study of all land which may be in some way affected by the reclamation act and the clearing off of that land, of course it applies to a vast quantity of land not owned by the Government?

To study the clearing off of private lands would be subject to a point of order, in my opinion, and we have no right to make an appropriation for that purpose if gentlemen propose to study the clearing off of private lands.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that to strike out the word "reclaim" might go beyond anything that could be called purely agricultural. The point of order is therefore sustained.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read. It is to be inserted after line 16 of page 22.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY].

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 16, page 22, insert the following: "For studying the methods of clearing off 'logged-off' lands with a view to their utilization for agricultural, horticultural, viticultural, and dairying purposes, and for the utilization of by-products arising in the process of clearing, $5,000."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make a point of order against that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that it is not in order, first, because it is not germane in this portion of the bill. These items are under the Bureau of Plant Industry, and the item for clearing off "logged-off" lands is not germane to the work of the Bureau of Plant Industry.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York this: If they do that for the purpose of agriculture, is it not the same as studying the effects of the boll weevil upon cotton?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That has nothing to do with this question. We are discussing the question whether, under the rules of the House, this amendment is in order at this particular point. Then, Mr. Chairman, whatever may be said as to whether the study of the methods of clearing off "logged-off" lands with a view to their utilization for agricultural purposes comes within the authority conferred upon the department under the organic act, certainly investigations for the utilization of by-products arising in the process of clearing are hardly investigations which are to be utilized in the advancement of agriculture.

I insist that there are a number of decisions which hold that even if a particular item be germane to the bill itself, it must be offered to that portion of the bill to which it is germane. The items now under consideration by the committee are under the general heading of the "Bureau of Plant Industry," on page 15 of the bill. Unless this item is germane to the work of the bureau it is not in order at this place. [Cries of "Rule!" "Rule!"]

The CHAIRMAN. To what division of the bill does the gentleman think this amendment should apply?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not required to answer that question, Mr. Chairman. This part of the bill, however, refers to the Bureau of Plant Industry, which has certain definite functions. This proposed provision is to enable an investigation to be made for the purpose of studying methods of clearing off "logged-off" lands. It is hardly proper or necessary for me, in order to sustain the contention that I make, that this amendment is not in order at this point, to furnish information to gentlemen as to what particular part of the bill it would be in order upon. Those questions can be determined as they arise.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this amendment is germane to this portion of the bill, inasmuch as the Department of Agriculture deals with the question of the utilization of soils and the growing of plants and trees and all other matters relating to products from the soil. It is just as germane as the paragraph before it, which has always been held to be in order.

As to the point made against the second portion of the paragraph, regarding by-products, that is just as germane as the fiber-plant investigation, the investigations of corn fiber for making paper, or a thousand other investigations that the bureau is carrying on.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman does not consider that the investigation of methods of clearing logged-off lands would properly come within the jurisdiction or the province of the Bureau of Plant Industry?

Mr. HAWLEY. I still maintain that the question of utilization of the by-products, whatever they may be, stumps or second growth, and so on, so that the greatest advantage may be derived from such lands, is just as germane to this portion of the bill as the utilization of corn fiber, flax fiber, or a thousand other investigations which the Bureau of Plant Industry is constantly making, and I insist that the amendment is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the study of methods of preparing logged-off lands for agriculture, horticulture, and so forth, would be within the general scope of agricultural purposes and would be germane to this bill at some place in it. With the single exception of the dairying purposes mentioned, all of the purposes mentioned are connected with the plant industry.

The point of order is overruled. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will not be adopted. If there be any department of the Government which is active in prosecuting investigations of value to those interested in agriculture, it is the Department of Agriculture. If there be any department of the Government which is quick to request Congress for assistance in order to enable it to conduct investigations which would be valuable to those interested in agriculture, it is the same department. No estimate was submitted for this appropriation. No request is made by the Department of Agriculture for this appropriation, but, according to the statement of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY], it appears that certain land companies in the Northwest and the far West have bought up great tracts of land over which the lumbermen have conducted their operations, and it is now desired that the assistance of the Federal Government be given to enable them to determine how best they may utilize the lands and best dispose of the property. It seems to me that there must be some place where the line should be drawn. There should be some point at which those who have acquired lands or have some interest in lands shall bear the expense incident to their ownership, without saddling the entire cost on the Federal Government.

Mr. HAWLEY. My purpose in mentioning the lumber company was because, as I explained later, that one company had agreed to contribute to the assistance of the Government in making these investigations. If the department was authorized to make the investigations, they agreed to contribute a sum of money just as a donation, which they could not make if the department was not authorized to make the investigation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand the position of the gentleman. The provision as originally incorporated in the bill provided for cooperation not only with companies but with States and individuals. If this land company desires this investigation, why should it not hire the experts rather than ask the investigation made by some one connected with the Department of Agriculture and thus utilize the department and its investigation for the purpose of advertising the lands for sale much to the misfortune very likely of those who will be induced to invest in them? The inquiry now being conducted as to certain investigations made by the Department of Agriculture regarding the value of lands under certain conditions in certain portions of the country should at least induce this House not to encourage a possible repetition of the same conditions.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Do I understand that these lands have been bought by corporations and others and that they now want the Government, at public expense, to show them how to make money out of their enterprise?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That seems to be the project. Here are these lands upon which there has been heavy timber. The timber has been cut and, unlike the early pioneers in this country and others who have acquired lands upon which the timber was standing and from which it has been cut, instead of clearing the lands and utilizing them for agricultural purposes, these owners believe that because the stumps are somewhat larger in these particular sections than they were in others that they should have the assistance of the Federal Treasury and Federal experts to do what all other classes of persons interested in land have done from the very first settlement of this country. It seems to me we ought to halt at some place, and this is one place. The department not having found any necessity for this enterprise, not having requested the appropriation, not having estimated for it, it seems to me the committee should not force the appropriation upon the department.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand the reasonableness of this suggestion. In my own State, where the Government owns no land and never has, there are millions of acres of these cleared lands, of what was timberland that has been cut off, denuded of the commercial timber, that has gone into farms. It is sold to farmers. Cotton and other produce is grown on it, and they never thought, as far as I am advised, of asking advice from the Government, or from any other source, as to how they were going to work to cultivate the soil and make a living. I can not see how the people of the West should require any more information than they do in Texas.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Oregon a question.

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman will have to get the permission of the gentleman from Texas, who has the floor.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Go ahead.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. In Missouri we sometimes blow the stumps out with dynamite and sometimes we pull them out with a stump puller.

Mr. HAWLEY. How are you going to pull out a stump that is 12 feet in diameter with a stump puller?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Dynamite will do it.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is what we want to find out, what is the best way.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Oh, I will tell you that and save the $5,000. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAWLEY. Now, the gentleman from Texas asked the gentleman from New York a question a moment ago which was hardly fair to the situation in the final result.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The unfairness was in the reply of the gentleman from New York, not in the question, I hope.

Mr. HAWLEY. I say in the result. The lands are owned, as you know, by large companies, who have cut off the timber and have no further use for them.

Mr. SLAYDEN. They do not give them away, do they?

Mr. HAWLEY. No; they have sold some and some have gone to the county for taxes; they have not paid the taxes on them. They are lying waste and idle. Large areas have passed into the hands of private ownership for grazing purposes. They are rich lands and are valuable if they can be cleared at a reasonable cost. Is it any more unreasonable to ask the Government to instruct us how to utilize these lands than it is for the Government to instruct the farmers in the South—which I am heartily in favor of—how to guard against the ravages of the boll weevil or the Texas cattle tick?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will say, in all frankness, that long ago I came to the conclusion that the investigations of the Government with reference to the boll weevil were not very valuable. I do not know so much about the investigations in regard to the cattle tick.

Mr. HAWLEY. We make a large appropriation for that purpose, and it is no more unreasonable for us to ask for this service than it is to appropriate for that service. These lands would be worth $500 an acre if cleared.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then I would spend that $5,000 myself, if I was the owner.

Mr. HAWLEY. Well, it might cost that amount to clear 1 acre of land.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman, in relation to the statement made by the gentleman from Oregon, I want to say that he has made it clear and specific as to the difference of these lands and those where small trees have grown. You go into the redwood district and you will find trees or the stumps of them 12 to 28 feet in diameter. How does that compare with little trees 2½ feet or 18 inches in diameter? These men have been experimenting for years. These lands are owned by private owners, and we want to show them how to improve the rest of the land. They have been advised to blow these stumps out, and have tried it, but they have not made a success. Why should not the Government give some assistance to the owners of these lands and assist them in information as to how to till their soil to make it more valuable just like you do in every other item in the bill? Reading back for five pages you will find every one of these items is for the purpose of showing the farmer how to do better work.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman think that anybody who owns 160 acres of land from which has been cut redwood timber 28 or 30 feet in diameter is in any great necessity for assistance from the Government as to how to utilize that land?

Mr. RAKER. In what way?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Financially.

Mr. RAKER. The owners of the land and of the timber that has been cut off have moved to Wall Street. The man that owned the land is not there now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. He has more sense than the man who remains there.

Mr. RAKER. No; he has not. The bone and the sinew is in the country. The men in this country are working to build up the country, raising stuff by which we can supply those living in the large cities. You have spent over a million dollars for investigations here, and the very time you come to a new one, when you come to hundreds of thousands of acres of this redwood land in California and Oregon, then you raise the cry of private ownership; yet when we turn back to the very next item above this we find you expending $69,000 for investigating private lands under reclamation projects. Why can you not expend $5,000 to investigate lands in redwood and spruce stumps?

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I move to close debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia to close debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HAWLEY) there were—ayes 17, noes 26.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing the necessary improvements to establish and maintain a general experiment farm and agricultural station on the Arlington estate, in the State of Virginia, in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress approved April 18, 1900, and for other general horticultural investigations, $36,920.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. What has become of the testing garden at Brownsville?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that it is carried in another part of the bill under the language of the introduction of foreign seeds, plants, and the like.

Mr. MANN. Why should it be transferred to an indefinite appropriation, where nobody can locate it, instead of having a definite appropriation in the bill that is specific?

Mr. LAMB. For the reason that the South Texas garden is conducted under the office of foreign seed and plant introduction and stands on the same basis as the other gardens conducted by that department. The proposed change is in the interest of good and better administration.

Mr. MANN. On what page is the other item?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the chairman of the committee a question?

Mr. LAMB. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. It is not the intention of the committee to abandon the work being done at the South Texas garden, is it?

Mr. LAMB. No.

Mr. MANN. That remains to be seen.

Mr. GARNER. That is what I concluded. Possibly, if you get the discretionary power placed in the Agricultural Department, there might be some question about this.

Mr. MANN. I want to see whether they have increased the appropriation anywhere else. It is easy to say that a thing is transferred. Where is the appropriation that covers it?

Mr. LEVER. I will read from the hearings:

Mr. LEVER. I notice at the bottom of page 31 an increase from $52,000 to $58,000.

Dr. GALLOWAY. That is owing to the fact that we took the Brownsville garden item and combined it with the seed and plant introduction work, where it properly belonged.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Do you gather those seeds from all over the country and from different sections of the country—different climatic conditions? What is your method of gathering seeds?

Dr. GALLOWAY. For the ordinary congressional distribution—

Mr. MANN. Permit me to interrupt. The appropriation for Brownsville testing station is $11,260. In the first place, you have reduced the amount for seeds from $289,000 to $285,000, and that is what you propose to have take care of the Brownsville testing garden, although the appropriation is reduced. Out of that you propose to have $58,740 for the foreign introduction of plants, and so forth. That is an increase of $5,250, or thereabouts, over the present appropriation, which is not sufficient to take care of Brownsville. What is proposed to be done?

Mr. LAMB. I asked that question:

The CHAIRMAN. "For the maintenance of a testing garden"—you leave that out.

Dr. GALLOWAY. Yes; we have combined this garden originally at Brownsville with the foreign seed and plant introduction work.

I read now from the Project Book:

This work includes the propagation of such new plant material as can be distributed from Brownsville to any part of the Gulf coast and other regions in the South—the testing out of such plants as have a good chance of succeeding in that portion of Texas.

If he did not have sufficient money to do this, I claim that he would not have been preparing his plans, and these are nothing but his plans, for doing it. It is a blanket appropriation, and we can not say exactly what Dr. Galloway proposes, but we know he has the matter well in hand.

Mr. MANN. Let us get down to brass tacks on this and see. The appropriation referred to is included in the appropriation for congressional seed, part of the same appropriation. In the first place, you segregate out of the congressional appropriation a certain amount for foreign-plant introduction. Now, you have reduced the appropriation for both purposes in this bill from existing law, although the present appropriation does not include the $11,200 for Brownsville. You make an appropriation for congressional seed and for the foreign-plant introduction, including Brownsville, and make the appropriation less than it is now, although the present appropriation does not include Brownsville. I want the gentleman to explain that if he can.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEVER. In answer to the gentleman from Illinois, it seems we are not able to lay our fingers on the very proposition—

Mr. MANN. I can lay my fingers on the proposition we are talking about; that is at the top of page 26.

Mr. LEVER. At the top of page 26, where the appropriation is $58,000.

Mr. MANN. That is the appropriation that Dr. Galloway is talking about; that is the foreign-plant introduction appropriation, and that is the one segregated from the congressional seed appropriation. If you have given all that they ask, I have not anything further to say.

Mr. LEVER. I will say, as a matter of fact, we have given every cent on that proposition that they have asked. I can not put my finger on the exact explanation of it, but in good conscience I will say to the gentleman we have given every cent asked on that proposition.

Mr. GARNER. If I understand the gentleman, there is no intention of abandoning the work at the Brownsville garden?

Mr. LEVER. Absolutely none.

Mr. LAMB. I can further answer the gentleman—is the gentleman satisfied?

Mr. MANN. I am satisfied until we get to the item where it comes up.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Purchase and distribution of valuable seeds: For purchase, propagation, testing, and distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants; all necessary office fixtures and supplies, fuel, transportation, paper, twine, gum, postal cards, gas, electric current, rent outside of the District of Columbia, official traveling expenses, and all necessary material and repairs for putting up and distributing the same; for repairs and the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $285,680, of which amount not less than $226,940 shall be allotted for congressional distribution. And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to expend the said sum, as nearly as practicable, in the purchase, testing, and distribution of such valuable seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, the best he can obtain at public or private sale, and such as shall be suitable for the respective localities to which the same are to be apportioned, and in which same are to be distributed as hereinafter stated, and such seeds so purchased shall include a variety of vegetable and flower seeds suitable for planting and culture in the various sections of the United States. An equal proportion of five-sixths of all seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants shall, upon their request, after due notification by the Secretary of Agriculture, be allotted to their respective districts in ready for distribution, be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates to Congress for distribution among their constituents, or mailed by the department upon the receipt of their addressed franks, in packages of such weight as the Secretary of Agriculture and the Postmaster General may jointly determine: Provided, however, That upon each envelope or wrapper containing packages of seeds the contents thereof shall be plainly indicated, and the Secretary shall not distribute to any Senator, Representative, or Delegate seeds entirely unfit for the climate and locality he represents, but shall distribute the same so that each Member may have seeds of equal value, as near as may be, and the best adapted to the locality he represents: Provided, also, That the seeds allotted to Senators and Representatives for distribution in the districts embraced within the twenty-fifth and thirty-fourth parallels of latitude shall be ready for delivery not later than the 10th day of January: Provided, also, That any portion of the allotments to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress remaining uncalled for on the 1st day of April shall be distributed by the Secretary of Agriculture, giving preference to those persons whose names and addresses have been furnished by Senators and Representatives in Congress, and who have not before during the same season been supplied by the department:

And provided also, That the Secretary shall report, as provided in this act, the place, quantity, and price of seeds purchased, and the date of purchase; but nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to prevent the Secretary of Agriculture from sending seeds to those who apply for the same. And the amount herein appropriated shall not be diverted or used for any other purpose but for the purchase, testing, propagation, and distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, mulberry and other rare and valuable trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants: Provided further, That $58,740 of which sum, or so much thereof as the Secretary of Agriculture shall direct, may be used to collect, purchase, test, propagate, and distribute rare and valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants from foreign countries or from our possessions for experiments with reference to their introduction into and cultivation in this country, and same shall not be distributed generally, but shall be used for experimental tests, to be carried on with the cooperation of the agricultural experiment stations.

Total for Bureau of Plant Industry, $2,089,900.

Mr. MANN, Mr. PAGE, and Mr. LAMB rose.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. LAMB. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. PAGE. Will the gentleman permit my amendment to be read?

Mr. LAMB. I will withdraw the motion for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the paragraph beginning on line 16, on page 23, and ending with line 10, on page 26, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Purchase and distribution of rare and valuable seeds and plants: For purchase, propagation, testing, and distribution of rare and valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants from foreign countries or from our possessions for experimenting with reference to their introduction into and cultivation in this country, and same shall be used for experimental tests, to be carried on with the cooperation of the agricultural experiment station, $58,740."

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. MANN. It is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. PAGE. I do not think it is subject to the point of order.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. BORLAND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 18960, the Agriculture appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill:

H. R. 13570. An act to amend an act entitled "An act granting to certain employees of the United States the right to receive from it compensation for injuries sustained in the course of their employment," approved May 30, 1908.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. CONNELL was granted leave of absence for 10 days, on account of illness in his family.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. In connection with the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANDERSON] I ask that the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] also have consent to extend his remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none and it is so ordered.

SOME OF PRESIDENT TAFT'S PROGRESSIVE POLICIES.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, this is a good time to take account of the national welfare as it is viewed by the President of the United States in the discharge of his official responsibilities. What President Taft has done, what his administration is doing, and what more it will do if Congress adopts the recommendations for constructive and progressive legislation may be learned from the messages which he has submitted since Congress met in December. I take this means of drawing attention to some of the more important subjects on which the President has communicated his views, and as the best way of doing this I quote his own language.

TRUSTS AND THE RIGHT OF COMPETITION.

In his message of December 5, 1911, on the Sherman antitrust law, the President said:

In May last the Supreme Court handed down decisions in the suits in equity brought by the United States to enjoin the further maintenance of the Standard Oil Trust and of the American Tobacco Trust and to secure their dissolution. The decisions are epoch making and serve to advise the business world authoritatively of the scope and operation of the antitrust act of 1890. The decisions do not depart in any substantial way from the previous decisions of the court in construing and applying this important statute, but they clarify those decisions by further defining the already admitted exceptions to the literal construction of the act. By the decrees they furnish a useful precedent as to the proper method of dealing with the capital and property of illegal trusts. These decisions suggest the need and wisdom of additional or supplemental legislation to make it easier for the entire business community to square with the rule of action and legality thus finally established and to preserve the benefit, freedom, and spur of reasonable competition without loss of real efficiency or progress.

Much is said of the repeal of this statute and of constructive legislation intended to accomplish the purpose and blaze a clear path for honest merchants and business men to follow. It may be that such a plan will be evolved, but I submit that the discussions which have been brought out in recent days by the fear of the continued execution of the antitrust law have produced nothing but glittering generalities and have offered no line of distinction or rule of action as definite and as clear as that which the Supreme Court itself lays down in enforcing the statute.

I see no objection—and, indeed, I can see decided advantages—in the enactment of a law which shall describe and denounce methods of competition which are unfair and are badges of the unlawful purpose denounced in the antitrust law. The attempt and purpose to suppress a competitor by underselling him at a price so unprofitable as to drive him out of business, or the making of exclusive contracts with customers under which they are required to give up association with other manufacturers, and numerous kindred methods for stifling competition and effecting monopoly, should be described with sufficient accuracy in a criminal statute, on the one hand, to enable the Government to shorten its task by prosecuting single misdemeanors instead of an entire conspiracy, and, on the other hand, to serve the purpose of pointing out more in detail to the business community what must be avoided.

I renew the recommendation of the enactment of a general law providing for the voluntary formation of corporations to engage in trade and commerce among the States and with foreign nations.

The opportunity thus suggested for Federal incorporation, it seems to me, is suitable constructive legislation needed to facilitate the squaring of great industrial enterprises to the rule of action laid down by the antitrust law. This statute, as construed by the Supreme Court, must continue to be the line of distinction for legitimate business. It must be enforced, unless we are to banish individualism from all business and reduce it to one common system of regulation or control of prices like that which now prevails with respect to public utilities, and which when applied to all business would be a long step toward State socialism.

The antitrust act is the expression of the effort of a freedom-loving people to preserve equality of opportunity. It is the result of the confident determination of such a people to maintain their future growth by preserving uncontrolled and unrestricted the enterprise of the individual, his industry, his ingenuity, his intelligence, and his independent courage.

THE INCREASED COST OF LIVING.

The President in his message of February 2, 1912, proposing an international commission to look into the cause for the high prices of the necessities of life, said:

* * * There is no doubt but that a commission could be appointed of such unprejudiced and impartial persons, experts in investigation of economic facts, that a great deal of very valuable light could be shed upon the reasons for the high prices that have so distressed the people of the world and information given upon which action might be taken to reduce the cost of living.

For some years past the high and steadily increasing cost of living has been a matter of such grave public concern that I deem it of great public interest that an international conference be proposed at this time for the purpose of preparing plans, to be submitted to the various Governments, for an international inquiry into the high cost of living, its extent, causes, effects, and possible remedies. I therefore recommend that, to enable the President to invite foreign Governments to such a conference, to be held at Washington or elsewhere, the Congress provide an appropriation, not to exceed $20,000, to defray the expenses of preparation and of participation by the United States.

The numerous investigations on the subject, official or other, already made in various countries, such as Austria, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, France, Germany, Great Britain, Italy, the Netherlands, and the United States, have themselves strongly demonstrated the need of further study of world-wide scope. Those who have conducted these investigations have found that the phenomenon of rising prices is almost if not quite general throughout the world, but they are baffled in the attempt to trace the causes by the impossibility of making any accurate international comparisons. This is because, in spite of the number of investigations already made, we are still without adequate data and because as yet no two countries estimate their price levels on the same basis or by the same methods.

REVISION OF THE WOOL TARIFF.

The President in communicating to Congress the report of the Tariff Board on Schedule K in his message of December 20, 1911, gave expression to these views:

I now herewith submit a report of the Tariff Board on Schedule K. The board is unanimous in its findings. On the basis of these findings I now recommend that the Congress proceed to a consideration of this schedule with a view to its revision and a general reduction of its rates.

The report shows in detail the difficulties involved in attempting to state in categorical terms the cost of wool production and the great differences in cost as between different regions and different types of wool. It is found, however, that, taking all varieties in account, the average cost of production for the whole American clip is higher than the cost in the chief competing country by an amount somewhat less than the present duty.

The findings of the board show that in this industry the actual manufacturing cost, aside from the question of the price of materials, is much higher in this country than it is abroad; that in the making of yarn and cloth the domestic woolen or worsted manufacturer has in general no advantage in the form of superior machinery or more efficient labor to offset the higher wages paid in this country. The findings show that the cost of turning wool into yarn in this country is about double that in the leading competing country, and that the cost of turning yarn into cloth is somewhat more than double. Under the protective policy a great industry, involving the welfare of hundreds of thousands of people, has been established despite these handicaps.

In recommending revision and reduction I therefore urge that action be taken with these facts in mind, to the end that an important and established industry may not be jeopardized.

It is no part of the function of the Tariff Board to propose rates of duty. Their function is merely to present findings of fact on which rates of duty may be fairly determined in the light of adequate knowledge in accord with the economic policy to be followed. This is what the present report does.

The findings of fact by the board show ample reason for the revision downward of Schedule K, in accord with the protective principle, and present the data as to relative costs and prices from which may be determined what rates will fairly equalize the difference in production costs. I recommend that such revision be proceeded with at once.

FOREIGN TRADE RELATIONS.

In his message of December 7, 1911, the President had this to say concerning the tariff and foreign trade relations:

While the double tariff feature of the tariff law of 1909 has been amply justified by the results achieved in removing former and preventing new undue discriminations against American commerce, it is believed that the time has come for the amendment of this feature of the law in such way as to provide a graduated means of meeting varying degrees of discriminatory treatment of American commerce in foreign countries as well as to protect the financial interests abroad of American citizens against arbitrary and injurious treatment on the part of foreign governments through either legislative or administrative measures.

It would also seem desirable that the maximum tariff of the United States should embrace within its purview the free list, which is not the case at the present time, in order that it might have reasonable significance to the governments of those countries from which the importations into the United States are confined virtually to articles on the free list.

The fiscal year ended June 30, 1911, shows great progress in the development of American trade. It was noteworthy as marking the highest record of exports of American products to foreign countries, the valuation being in excess of $2,000,000,000. These exports showed a gain over the preceding year of more than $300,000,000.

As I have indicated, it is increasingly clear that to obtain and maintain that equity and substantial equality of treatment essential to the flourishing foreign trade, which becomes year by year more important to the industrial and commercial welfare of the United States, we should have a flexibility of tariff sufficient for the give and take of negotiation by the Department of State on behalf of our commerce and industry.

I need hardly reiterate the conviction that there should speedily be built up an American merchant marine. This is necessary to assure favorable transportation facilities to our great ocean-borne commerce as well as to supplement the Navy with an adequate reserve of ships and men. It would have the economic advantage of keeping at home part of the vast sums now paid foreign shipping for carrying American goods. All the great commercial nations pay heavy subsidies to their merchant marine, so that it is obvious that without some wise aid from the Congress the United States must lag behind in the matter of merchant marine in its present anomalous position.

PROVISIONS FOR PANAMA CANAL TRAFFIC.

After describing the very satisfactory progress made on the Panama Canal the President, in his message of December 21, 1911, said:

I renew my recommendation with respect to the tolls of the canal that within limits which shall seem wise to Congress the power of fixing tolls be given to the President. In order to arrive at a proper conclusion there must be some experimenting, and this can not be done if Congress does not delegate the power to one who can act expeditiously.

I am very confident that the United States has the power to relieve from the payment of tolls any part of our shipping that Congress deems wise. We own the canal. It was our money that built it. We have the right to charge tolls for its use. Those tolls must be the same to everyone; but when we are dealing with our own ships the practice of many governments of subsidizing their own merchant vessels is so well established in general that a subsidy equal to the tolls, an equivalent remission of tolls, can not be held to be a discrimination in the use of the canal. The practice in the Suez Canal makes this clear. The experiment in tolls to be made by the President would doubtless disclose how great a burden of tolls the coastwise trade between the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts could bear without preventing its usefulness in competition with the transcontinental railroads. One of the chief reasons for building the canal was to set up this competition and to bring the two shores closer together as a practical trade problem. It may be that the tolls will have to be wholly remitted. I do not think this is the best principle, because I believe that the cost of such a Government work as the Panama Canal ought to be imposed gradually but certainly upon the trade which it creates and makes possible. So far as we can, consistent with the development of the world's trade through the canal and the benefit which it was intended to secure to the east and west coastwise trade, we ought to labor to secure from the canal tolls a sufficient amount ultimately to meet the debt which we have assumed and to pay the interest.

POSTAL SAVINGS SYSTEM AND PARCEL POST.

In the message of the same date the President reviewed the success of the postal savings system as follows:

On January 3, 1911, postal savings depositories were established experimentally in 48 States and Territories. After three months' successful operation the system was extended as rapidly as feasible to the 7,500 post offices of the first, second, and third classes constituting the presidential grade. By the end of the year practically all of these will have been designated, and then the system will be extended to all fourth-class post offices doing a money-order business.

The deposits have kept pace with the extension of the system. Amounting to only $60,652 at the end of the first month's operation in the experimental offices, they increased to $679,310 by July, and now, after 11 months of operation, have reached a total of $11,000,000. This sum is distributed among 2,710 banks, and protected under the law by bonds deposited with the Treasurer of the United States.

The depositors thus far number approximately 150,000. They include 40 nationalities, native Americans largely predominating, and English and Italians coming next.

The President renewed his previous recommendations for a parcel post and called especial attention to the expected benefit in reducing the cost of living in the following language:

Steps should be taken immediately for the establishment of a rural parcel post.

It is hoped that Congress will authorize the immediate establishment of a limited parcel post on such rural routes as may be selected, providing for the delivery along the routes of parcels not exceeding 11 pounds, which is the weight limit for the international parcel post, or at the post office from which such route emanates, or on another route emanating from the same office. Such preliminary service will prepare the way for the more thorough and comprehensive inquiry contemplated in asking for the appropriation mentioned, enable the department to gain definite information concerning the practical operation of a general system, and at the same time extend the benefit of the service to a class of people who, above all others, are specially in need of it.

The suggestion that we have a general parcel post has awakened great opposition on the part of some who think that it will have the effect to destroy the business of the country storekeeper. Instead of doing this, I think the change will greatly increase business for the benefit of all. The reduction in the cost of living it will bring about ought to make its coming certain.

NATIONAL FINANCES AND MONETARY REFORM.

In his message of the same date the President said that the financial condition of the Government, as shown at the close of the last fiscal year, June 30, 1911, was very satisfactory. The interest-bearing debt of the United States on that date amounted to $915,353,190. With reference to the high credit of the United States it has been said:

The credit of this Government was shown to be better than that of any other Government by the sale of the Panama Canal 3 per cent bonds. These bonds did not give their owners the privilege of using them as a basis for bank-note circulation, nor was there any other privilege extended to them which would affect their general market value. Their sale, therefore, measured the credit of the Government. The premium which was realized upon the bonds made the actual interest rate of the transaction 2.909 per cent.

Regarding monetary reform, among other things in this message, the President said:

A matter of first importance that will come before Congress for action at this session is monetary reform. The Congress has itself arranged an early introduction of this great question through the report of its Monetary Commission.

It is exceedingly fortunate that the wise and undisputed policy of maintaining unchanged the main features of our banking system rendered it at once impossible to introduce a central bank; for a central bank would certainly have been resisted, and a plan into which it could have been introduced would probably have been defeated. But as a central bank could not be a part of the only plan discussed or considered, that troublesome question is eliminated. And ingenious and novel as the proposed National Reserve Association appears, it simply is a logical outgrowth of what is best in our present system, and is, in fact, the fulfillment of that system.

I trust that all banks of the country possessing the requisite standards will be placed upon a footing of perfect equality of opportunity. Both the national system and the State system should be fairly recognized, leaving them eventually to coalesce, if that shall prove to be their tendency. But such evolution can not develop impartially if the banks of one system are given or permitted any advantages of opportunity over those of the other system. And I trust also that the new legislation will carefully and completely protect and assure the individuality and the independence of each bank, to the end that any tendency there may ever be toward a consolidation of the money or banking power of the Nation shall be defeated.

With the present prospects of this long-awaited reform encouraging us, it would be singularly unfortunate if this monetary question should by any chance become a party issue. And I sincerely hope it will not.

ECONOMY AND EFFICIENCY.

In submitting the report of progress made in the inquiry into the efficiency and economy of the methods of transacting public business, in his message of January 17, 1912, the President said:

Efficiency and economy in the Government service have been demanded with increasing insistence for a generation. Real economy is the result of efficient organization. By perfecting the organization the same benefits may be obtained at less expense. A reduction in the total of the annual appropriations is not in itself a proof of economy, since it is often accompanied by a decrease in efficiency. The needs of the Nation may demand a large increase of expenditure, yet to keep the total appropriations within the expected revenue is necessary to the maintenance of public credit.

The operations of the Government affect the interest of every person living within the jurisdiction of the United States. Its organization embraces stations and centers of work located in every city and in many local subdivisions of the country. Its gross expenditures amount to nearly $1,000,000 annually. Including the personnel of the Military and Naval Establishments, more than 400,000 persons are required to do the work imposed by law upon the executive branch of the Government.

Although earnest efforts have been put forth by administrative officers and though many special inquiries have been made by the Congress, no exhaustive investigation has ever before been instituted concerning the methods employed in the transaction of public business with a view to the adoption of the practices and procedure best fitted to secure the transaction of such business with maximum dispatch, economy, and efficiency.

With large interests at stake, the Congress and the administration have never had all the information which should be currently available if the most intelligent direction is to be given to the business in hand.

I am convinced that results which are really worth while can not be secured, or at least can be secured only in small part, through the prosecution at irregular intervals of special inquiries bearing on particular services or features of administration. The benefits thus obtained must be but temporary. The problem of good administration is not one that can be solved at one time. It is a continuously present one.

In accordance with my instructions, the Commission on Economy and Efficiency, which I organized to aid me in the inquiry, has directed its efforts primarily to the formulation of concrete recommendations looking to the betterment of the fundamental conditions under which governmental operations must be carried on. With a basis thus laid, it has proceeded to the prosecution of detailed studies of individual services and classes of work and of particular practices and methods, pushing these studies as far, and covering as many points and services, as the resources and time at its disposal have permitted.

The United States is the only great Nation whose Government is operated without a budget. This fact seems to be more striking when it is considered that budgets and budget procedures are the outgrowth of democratic doctrines and have had an important part in the development of modern constitutional rights. The American Commonwealth has suffered much from irresponsibility on the part of its governing agencies. The constitutional purpose of a budget is to make government responsive to public opinion and responsible for its acts.

A budget should be the means for getting before the legislative branch, before the press, and before the people a definite annual program of business to be financed; it should be in the nature of a prospectus both of revenues and expenditures; it should comprehend every relation of the Government to the people, whether with reference to the raising of revenues or the rendering of service.

COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

In his message of February 2, 1912, in discussing industrial relations, the President said:

The extraordinary growth of industry in the past two decades and its revolutionary changes have raised new and vital questions as to the relations between employers and wage earners which have become matters of pressing public concern. These questions have been somewhat obscured by the profound changes in the relations between competing producers and producers as a class and consumers—in other words, by the changes which, among other results, have given rise to what is commonly called the trust problem. The large-scale production characteristic of modern industry, however, involves the one set of relations no less than the other. Any interruption to the normal and peaceful relations between employer and wage earner involves public discomfort and in many cases public disaster. Such interruptions become, therefore, quite as much a matter of public concern as restraint of trade or monopoly.

Industrial relations concern the public for a double reason. We are directly interested in the maintenance of peaceful and stable industrial conditions for the sake of our own comfort and well-being; but society is equally interested, in its sovereign civic capacity, in seeing that our institutions are effectively maintaining justice and fair dealing between all classes of citizens whose economic interests may seem to clash.

The special investigations that have been made of recent industrial conditions, whether private or official, have been fragmentary, incomplete, and at best only partially representative or typical. Their lessons, nevertheless, are important, and until something comprehensive and adequate is available they serve a useful purpose, and they will necessarily continue to be made. But unquestionably the time is now ripe for a searching inquiry into the subject of industrial relations which shall be official, authoritative, balanced, and well rounded, such as only the Federal Government can successfully undertake. The present widespread interest in the subject makes this an opportune time for an investigation, which in any event can not long be postponed. It should be nonpartisan, comprehensive, thorough, patient, and courageous.

PUBLICITY FOR RAILWAY SECURITIES.

The President, in transmitting, on December 11, 1911, the report made by the Railroad Securities Commission, which was appointed under the authority of the act to create a Commerce Court, said that he heartily concurred in the recommendations of the commission, and he urged that appropriate action be taken to carry them into effect. The section of the commission's report in regard to publicity is as follows:

In place of any added Federal requirements concerning payment for capital stock, your commission recommends the adoption of provisions regarding publicity which will show the actual facts regarding stock and bond issues in the several States and the consideration received therefor. Any railroad doing interstate business which issues bonds or stocks should be required by statute to furnish the Interstate Commerce Commission at the time of the issue with a full statement of the details of the issue, the amount of the proceeds, and the purposes for which the proceeds are to be used, followed in due time by an accounting for such proceeds, as more fully hereinafter set forth.

Every company should be required to furnish to the Interstate Commerce Commission at specified dates a full statement, including the names of the parties concerned, of all financial transactions that have taken place during the periods covered by the report, whether in cash, in securities, or in other valuable considerations, and whether embraced in income account or outside of it. This statement should also include the disposition of the surplus. Every company should be further required to compile for the information of its shareholders facts in regard to the financial transactions of the company for its fiscal year of such a character and in such form as the Interstate Commerce Commission may direct.

LESSENING THE COST OF LITIGATION.

President Taft's positive views on simplifying legal procedure and preventing delay and unnecessary cost of litigation were indictated in his message of December 21, 1911. In that message the President said:

In promotion of the movement for the prevention of delay and unnecessary cost in litigation, I am glad to say that the Supreme Court has taken steps to reform the present equity rules of the Federal courts, and that we may in the near future expect a revision of them which will be a long step in the right direction.

The American Bar Association has recommended to Congress several bills expediting procedure, one of which has already passed the House unanimously February 6, 1911. This directs that no judgment should be set aside or reversed or new trial granted unless it appears to the court, after an examination of the entire cause, that the error complained of has injuriously affected the substantial rights of the parties, and also provides for the submission of issues of fact to a jury, reserving questions of law for subsequent argument and decision. I hope this bill will pass the Senate and become law, for it will simplify the procedure at law.

Another bill to amend chapter 11 of the judicial code, in order to avoid errors in pleading, was presented by the same association, and one enlarging the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, so as to permit that court to examine, upon a writ of error, all cases in which any right or title is claimed under the Constitution, or any statute or treaty of the United States, whether the decision in the court below has been against the right or title or in its favor. Both these measures are in the interest of justice and should be passed.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois, the leader of the minority, if we could not take a recess until 8 o'clock for the purpose of going on with this bill?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I think we are getting along as fast on this bill as we usually do.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 31 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Wednesday, March 6, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, submitting, by direction of the President, proposed amendment to the estimate for an appropriation for surveying the public lands as contained in the Book of Estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913; to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, submitting estimate of appropriation for incidental expenses in office of ex officio secretary of the District of Alaska, omitted in Book of Estimates for 1913 by inadvertence (H. Doc. No. 593); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War, submitting supplemental estimate of appropriation required by War Department for increasing the capacity of Rock Island Arsenal for production of Field Artillery for the fiscal year 1913 (H. Doc. No. 592); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, submitting estimate of appropriation for beginning the construction of the Ganado Irrigation Project on the Navajo Indian Reservation in Arizona (H. Doc. No. 591); to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

5. A letter from the acting president of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting report of the excise board of the District of Columbia for the license year ended October 31, 1911 (H. Doc. No. 594); to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 19418) to amend section 5 of an act entitled "An act to regulate fees and costs, and for other purposes," approved February 22, 1875, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 393), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R.

20491) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to grant further extension of time within which to make proof on desert-land entries, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 394), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred, as follows:

By Mr. STEPHENS of Texas: A bill (H. R. 21356) to repeal the provisions of the Indian appropriation acts of June 21, 1906, and March 1, 1907, removing restrictions as to sale, incumbrance, or taxation of allotments within the White Earth Indian Reservation in the State of Minnesota; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. SPARKMAN: A bill (H. R. 21357) amending section 32, chapter 1244, act of October 1, 1890, amending section 3392 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by section 16, of the act of March 1, 1879; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. KENT: A bill (H. R. 21358) to repeal section 3 of an act entitled "An act in reference to the expatriation of citizens and their protection abroad," approved March 2, 1907; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. MORRISON: A bill (H. R. 21359) to amend the postal laws and regulations pertaining to the second class of mail matter; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. YOUNG of Kansas: A bill (H. R. 21360) establishing the pensionable disabilities of Civil War soldiers; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LAFFERTY: A bill (H. R. 21361) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior within his discretion to exchange desert lands for lands within national forests limits; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. JACKSON: A bill (H. R. 21362) to divest intoxicating liquors of their interstate-commerce character; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. FLOOD of Virginia: A bill (H. R. 21363) authorizing the purchase of the Natural Bridge of Virginia; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. KORBLY: A bill (H. R. 21364) authorizing the Secretary of War to convert the regimental Army post at Fort Benjamin Harrison, Ind., into a brigade post; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. FIELDS: A bill (H. R. 21365) to provide for the erection of a public building at Cynthiana, Ky.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado: A bill (H. R. 21366) providing for the adjustment of the claims of the States and Territories to lands within national forests; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. STEPHENS of California: A bill (H. R. 21367) to enable the city of Los Angeles, Cal., to carry out its plans for the construction of municipal wharves, docks, slips, warehouses, and other appliances for commerce and navigation in Los Angeles Harbor, Cal.; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. GRAHAM: A bill (H. R. 21368) for the immediate relief of the sick, diseased, and destitute Chippewa Indians within the White Earth Reservation in Minnesota; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. ASHBROOK: Concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 42) to print 3,000 copies of Hearings No. 54 on House resolution 109; to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. LAFFERTY: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 260) directing that in the future expenditure of the reclamation fund the President shall give a preference to those States that have heretofore contributed more than they have received until reimbursed; to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands.

By Mr. SIMMONS: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 261) providing for reference to the International Joint Commission of the question of the pollution of the waters of Lake Erie and the Niagara River; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. UNDERWOOD: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 262) creating a committee of Congress to investigate the building of post roads in the United States; to the Committee on Rules.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio: A bill (H. R. 21369) granting an increase of pension to Abraham D. Shidler; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21370) granting an increase of pension to John J. Chrystler; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21371) granting an increase of pension to Henry Friar; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21372) granting an increase of pension to William H. England; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21373) granting an increase of pension to John Herr; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21374) granting an increase of pension to Samuel Douglass; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21375) granting a pension to Frank A. Pfefferle; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. AUSTIN: A bill (H. R. 21376) for the relief of Burrell F. Badgett; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. BARTHOLDT: A bill (H. R. 21377) granting an increase of pension to Thomas B. Chapman; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BURNETT: A bill (H. R. 21378) granting an increase of pension to William Wells; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CLARK of Missouri: A bill (H. R. 21379) granting an increase of pension to George Wagner; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21380) granting an increase of pension to Verona Withans; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 21381) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth Henry Ball; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. COOPER: A bill (H. R. 21382) granting an increase of pension to George Coulter; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DICKINSON: A bill (H. R. 21383) granting an increase of pension to Isaac D. Combs; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DODDS: A bill (H. R. 21384) granting a pension to Augusta Schlader; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DRAPER: A bill (H. R. 21385) granting an increase of pension to James A. Buck; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DANIEL A. DRISCOLL: A bill (H. R. 21386) granting an increase of pension to Paul Hirschfield; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DYER: A bill (H. R. 21387) restoring the name of Charlotte Judd to the pension roll; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Clarke, Ark.	Lippitt	Perkins	Wetmore
Crawford	Lodge	Pomerene	Works
Cullom	Lorimer	Poyner

Mr. LEA. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. TAYLOR] is necessarily absent from the city.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

GENERAL ARBITRATION TREATIES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the treaties of arbitration between Great Britain and France and the United States.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, it had been my purpose to confine myself in this discussion exclusively to a consideration of the question as to what amendments should be adopted if these treaties are to be put in a shape where they can command the support of those of us who think that in their present shape they are extremely objectionable and obnoxious to the provisions of our Federal Constitution. The wide range, however, of the discussion yesterday afternoon will make it necessary that I should go somewhat more largely into the subject than I otherwise would have done.

We have before us, Mr. President, two treaties in identical terms, although I believe the particular treaty under consideration is that proposed to be made with Great Britain. Naturally, sometimes, I presume, we will refer to them in discussion in the plural and sometimes in the singular, but if so, the reason will be understood.

There are, Mr. President, in fact, very few provisions in these treaties which are at all new. There has been a very active propaganda in the interest of the ratification of the treaties which has naturally by reason of its activity and urgency excited very widespread interest. Yet it is a fact which I think can be very clearly demonstrated that with the exception of the objectionable third clause to the third article there is little or nothing in these treaties which is not already found in existing arbitration treaties. If there is a difference in words between the existing treaties and the proposed treaties, it is true that in the application of the provisions of these treaties by the friends and advocates of the treaties to questions which may arise, there is practically little or no difference between the provisions found therein and the provisions already found in The Hague convention and in the 25 general arbitration treaties which we now have with other nations, 45 nations having been parties to The Hague convention, which is a treaty between these 45 nations making provision for the permanent court of arbitration for the settlement of international differences.

For instance, Mr. President, in the general treaties which are now in force and which were negotiated in 1908 there are found these words:

Provided, nevertheless, That they do not affect the vital interests, the independence, or the honor of the two contracting States.

Those words are left out of the proposed treaties, those now pending before us, and yet when pressed by those of us who think that such matters should not be arbitrated except in cases where the Senate voluntarily consents thereto, the advocates of the treaties say that such questions would not be arbitrated under the proposed treaties. So that with this construction and application by the advocates of the proposed treaties there is in this particular no practical difference between the existing arbitration treaties we now have with 25 nations and the treaties now before us for consideration.

I simply present that by way of illustration. The illustrations could be extended, and they all of them are demonstrable of the fact that in practical application, at least so far as contended for by the friends of these treaties, all the material provisions, speaking generally of course, are in the main provisions which are drawn from existing treaties and from The Hague convention. There is no question that the language of these proposed treaties greatly enlarges the scope of the existing arbitration treaties, in that they embrace questions of national honor, vital interests, and independence of the Nation; but when we point out the danger of permitting outside parties to decide when we should be compelled to arbitrate such questions, they reply that the proposed treaties would not permit such questions to be referred to this outside commission.

The objectionable third clause to the third article of the proposed treaties is one which in terms provides that where there is a difference between this country and either of the other countries, parties to the treaty, as to whether or not a claim or a difference is arbitrable under the terms of the treaty, that that question shall be referred to an outside commission, and that that outside commission shall determine the matter, and, as those of us who object to this provision contend, shall determine it finally for the Senate. Whether the Senate should finally obey it or not, such, in our opinion, is the legal effect of the provision.

Before proceeding with the discussion I wish to call attention to some of the provisions of this proposed treaty which seems to have escaped the attention of Senators who have discussed the matter before the Senate.

It is a mistake, Mr. President, to contend that the matters to be submitted to the decision of this outside commission are only matters which are specified in article 1 of the proposed treaty. Article 1, the language of which has been emphasized as being that which is to limit and control the jurisdiction of arbitration and the jurisdiction of this joint commission for investigation, is in these words:

All differences hereafter arising between the high contracting parties, which it has not been possible to adjust by diplomacy, relating to international matters in which the high contracting parties are concerned by virtue of a claim of right made by one against the other under treaty or otherwise, and which are justiciable in their nature, etc.

But article 2 very largely increases the scope of the investigation. Article 2, which provides for the joint high commission, has this language in it:

The high contracting parties further agree to institute, as occasion arises and as hereinafter provided, a joint high commission of inquiry, to which, upon the request of either party, shall be referred for impartial and conscientious investigation any controversy between the parties within the scope of article 1, before such controversy has been submitted to arbitration, and also any other controversy hereafter arising between them even if they are not agreed that it falls within the scope of article 1.

That language is as broad and as comprehensive as language can possibly be framed to express an idea. It not only enlarges the scope of investigation of this outside investigation, but it enlarges it without limitation.

Another most important thing to be borne in mind in the discussion is that this joint high commission is not limited to a commission composed of nationals, as the term is used in diplomatic intercourse—that is, citizens or subjects of the one and the other of these countries—but there is a provision under which the President of the United States and the representative of the other government could form that commission in any way and of any persons whom they saw fit to agree upon. It is not provided in any manner that there shall be any representation by any citizen or officer of the United States upon that commission in case the executive branches of the two governments should see fit to constitute it otherwise. The language is this:

Whenever a question or matter of difference is referred to the joint high commission of inquiry, as herein provided, each of the high contracting parties shall designate three of its nationals to act as members of the commission of inquiry for the purposes of such reference; or the commission may be otherwise constituted in any particular case by the terms of reference, the membership of the commission and the terms of reference to be determined in each case by an exchange of notes.

That is without any limitation whatever. It can be done, as it is frequently done in cases of international arbitration, by the appointment of some crowned head of Europe. That is one of the most usual methods adopted in constituting boards of arbitration or boards having offices to perform in connection with arbitration. So that those two things are to be kept clearly in mind when we are discussing the question whether this treaty, in the first place, in the provision which I have specially in mind is constitutional, and, second, whether, if constitutional, it is safe for us to adopt it.

The field of arbitration is unlimited. The scope of subjects which may be subjected to arbitration are without any limitation whatever, subject only to such limitation as this outside commission may decide. The board of inquiry may be constituted of any foreigners that the executive heads of the two governments may see fit to select for that purpose, thus in such case organizing a board constituted of foreigners to determine what the Senate of the United States shall do under the bidding of this foreign board.

Another thing that I will simply mention in passing, that there is not any provision in the treaties as now framed under which the representatives of this Government, in case the board should be constituted of three nationals of each government, are to be confirmed by the Senate. That is simply a proposition to be attended to hereafter. It is not in the treaty as sent to us. Of course, in case the outside commission is composed of foreigners, there can be no provision for the confirmation of its members by the Senate.

Mr. President, from my view of the nature of this third clause of article 3 it would be impossible for me to vote for these treaties unless this clause were entirely eliminated, or unless—which is not the better plan, although it may be an efficacious plan—unless in the resolution of ratification this clause is entirely and utterly nullified. It will not do to qualify or to endeavor to lessen its force. For me nothing will be sufficient except an utter elimination of the third clause or an utter nullification and destruction of it in another way.

The third clause of article 3—I will read it, as we shall frequently have occasion to refer to it—after providing for the joint commission of inquiry, is in this language:

It is further agreed, however, that in cases in which the parties disagree as to whether or not a difference is subject to arbitration under article 1 of this treaty, that question shall be submitted to the joint high commission of inquiry; and if all or all but one of the members of the commission agree and report that such difference is within the scope of article 1, it shall be referred to arbitration in accordance with the provisions of this treaty.

My objection to that clause, Mr. President, is twofold: First, that it is absolutely unconstitutional and beyond the power of the Senate to agree to; and, second, that if it were not unconstitutional it would be unsafe for us to commit ourselves to any such obligation.

I will remark in passing that the friends of the treaties themselves differ as to whether or not this clause is binding upon the Senate. Some of them contend that it is not binding upon the Senate, and that the Senate would be as free to act after the adoption of these treaties in the consideration of any proposed treaty which had been reported upon favorably by this commission as it would be if the President should send a treaty to us without its ever having gone to a commission. There are others who, I think, very conclusively contend that the only proper construction of this clause is that the finding of this board of inquiry is to be obligatory upon the Senate when an issue of this kind is referred to it, and that the Senate could not disregard it without a violation of the terms of the treaty. My honored friend, who sits in front of me, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], I think, has presented a very conclusive argument upon that subject. Although he favors the treaties, he thinks that is the proper construction of them. Before I get through I am going to read a paragraph from his argument upon that subject, which will probably, in some degree, take away the necessity of my discussing it as fully as I otherwise would. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] and the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOR] in their joint report, while they do not discuss it in the same way as does the Senator from Maryland, and do not state it as explicitly, come to a conclusion in reference to these treaties which can, of course, have no possible consistency except in the recognition of the fact, as they evidently intend it shall be recognized, that the proper construction of this third clause is the same as that for which the Senator from Maryland contends, to wit, that the finding of this outside commission is binding on the Senate.

Mr. President, in order to simplify the argument, it is possibly better to discuss the subject from the standpoint of those Senators and from the standpoint of the construction which not only I myself put upon it, but which, I understand, those who agree with me in regard to the objectionableness of this clause also put upon it; in other words, to discuss it from the standpoint of the binding obligation of the third clause of the third article of these treaties.

Before I finish I intend to discuss the question as to what is the true construction of this objectionable clause, and it seems to me that from the language of the clause itself and from the comparison of that language with the corresponding article in The Hague treaty, from which it is taken and to which an addition has been made, there can be no legitimate deduction other than that arrived at by the Senator from Maryland, the Senator from Illinois, and the Senator from New York, that it is a binding obligation on the Senate as expressed in the treaty.

Mr. President, from the standpoint that it is a binding obligation, and intended to be a binding obligation upon the Senate, to delegate to this outside commission the power to decide the question whether or not a particular difference is one which is justiciable under the treaty and is one which the Senate will be compelled under the treaty to submit to arbitration, I have no hesitation in the world in the conclusion that it is utterly and absolutely unconstitutional.

The language of the Constitution in regard to the making of treaties, referring to the President, is very brief. It is as follows:

He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

That language is also without limitation as to the duty of the Senate. It does not say that the President shall have the power to make a treaty, provided two-thirds of the Senators present advise and consent as to a part of the treaty, but necessarily the requirement is that they advise and consent to every part of the treaty, certainly every essential part of the treaty. It is a simple question whether or not the preliminary, the main, question as to whether arbitration shall be entered upon for the settlement of a certain international difference is or is not an important part of a treaty. I assert without fear of successful contradiction that in the large majority of instances of international difference where arbitration is proposed the controlling question is whether the United States will or will not submit to arbitration the settlement of such international difference. It is not only the controlling question, but in the large majority of instances of international differences and in almost every one that can be conceived of it is, where arbitration is proposed, the important and essential question.

It is a comparatively slight and small matter to formulate the terms of a treaty after it has been determined to make such treaty. Anybody with good business capacity can do so.

After it had been determined upon to make a treaty of arbitration, any committee of the Senate could retire and in a little while formulate satisfactorily the terms of a treaty, but the question as to whether or not a certain international difference shall be submitted to arbitration or whether it is a matter which shall not be submitted to arbitration is a question which requires the thought and the study and the most careful consideration of the entire Senate, and one which the Constitution of the United States provides shall not even be determined by a majority of the Senate, but that two-thirds of the Senators present must concur before so important a conclusion shall be reached and it be made the supreme law of the land. To say that that question shall be determined by this outside commission and not by the Senate and against the wish of the Senate is to violate the command of the Constitution that two-thirds of the Senate shall determine it.

Mr. President, I am going to run hastily through some of these questions which could be presented for arbitration under these treaties. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge], in his able and comprehensive speech on this subject, enumerated a number of them for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that there were questions that we would not submit to arbitration. I am going hastily to run over those mentioned by him, and possibly some others. I shall mention them not only for the purpose of presenting to Senators the fact that they cover questions that we would not be willing to submit to arbitration, but also to present to Senators this question: When it is proposed to arbitrate these questions, is the question whether or not we will submit them to arbitration the main and controlling question which the Senate would have to consider? That question is the one which these treaties provide shall be determined by somebody else and not by the Senate, and even over the objection of the Senate.

Of course, Mr. President, if the President and the Senate, representing the Government of the United States and the sovereign power in this particular, shall make these treaties with Great Britain and France, it must make similar treaties with any other nation that demands that it may have the opportunity to be made a party to such an agreement with the United States. China, Japan, or any other country can not be refused, and therefore the list of questions which may arise is not confined to the list of questions which may arise between this country and Great Britain or this country and France, but we have to consider questions which are likely to arise between this country and any other country, and we have to consider what would be our attitude if such questions were presented.

Take some of the questions which the Senator from Massachusetts enumerated; for instance, the question of immigration, one of the most important questions with which this country has to deal, a question absolutely vital to some sections of the country, especially to the States of the Pacific coast.

The citizens of those States could not exist in the absence of the restriction of Asiatic immigration; they would soon cease to be the possessors of that soil, and that would soon be a section in which no white man could live, except as the few live who go over to China and Japan for the purpose of prosecuting certain industries. If, Mr. President—which is not unlikely at all, for we know the difficulties we have had in connection with the immigration question so far as our western coast is concerned—if China or Japan should be a party to a treaty like this, and should then demand of us that the question of immigration, and the general admission of their people be submitted to arbitration because of a difference between us in regard to it, and that question was presented to the Senate in a proposed treaty with China or Japan, would not the question whether we would submit it to arbitration be the main question for our consideration? If it would be the main question and an essential question, then in such a proposed treaty could the Senate, under the Constitution, leave it to an outside commission to determine for the Senate and against its will that that question should be submitted to arbitration?

I am not going to omit, Mr. President, and shall attend to it before I finish, a consideration of the issue which has been raised by some of the reports submitted by the minority of the Foreign Relations Committee, and also by Senators on the floor, the question of the extent to which the authority proposed to be given to the outside commission is a delegation of power as compared to the statutes conferring powers upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to make reasonable regulations, and upon collectors of customs to execute the tariff law, and so forth and so on; so that Senators, as I go along, will not consider that I am evading that part of the question. I may have to take that up a little later than I find it convenient to do now in this particular part of the argument. Would or would not that be the main question, Shall we submit the matter of the control of immigration to arbitration; and if the main question, under the constitutional limitation, coupled as it is with an obligation and a command, can we say that another power, another body than the Senate of the United States, can take our place and speak for the Senate on that grave question, and determine for two-thirds of the Senate whether that main and essential part of the proposed treaty shall be advised and consented to by the Senate?

I am not talking, Mr. President, as to whether or not these things are likely to happen. That is not the question for us to consider. It is a question to consider if we are considering the matter simply from the standpoint of policy and expediency, but from a legal standpoint the question is a question of power; it is a question of duty; it is a question of obligation; it is a question of adhering to and obeying the solemn mandate of the Constitution.

Mr. President, while I am on this subject I would say that that is not confined to the Pacific coast. We have a great problem in the East as to immigration. We have but recently taken the position that we have a right to be heard by another government as to the right under an existing treaty of our citizens to go into that country, and without stopping to elaborate it, it is a very easy matter to anticipate that the time will come when a similar demand may be made upon us by a foreign nation. When such demand is refused by us, and a demand for arbitration shall be made, when a treaty providing for such arbitration is presented, it will be the main question for us to determine, in view of the horde which comes annually upon us, and which our people now are trying so strenuously to resist and to regulate and to control, whether or not we consider that a question to be arbitrated. The main question in any such proposed arbitration would be whether we would arbitrate it or whether we would not arbitrate it, whether we would submit to the judgment of another party to say whether we should, against our will, arbitrate it. If we permitted an outside commission to determine that main question, we would be delegating to that outside commission the duty and the power to practically determine whether the Senate should advise and consent to the most important part of a proposed treaty. Is argument necessary to show that such delegation would be unconstitutional?

I omitted to speak, while I was discussing matters which interested the Pacific coast, of the question of schools in the States and who shall enter them. It is a question which certainly is within the range of probability—not possibility, but probability—to come up under the demand that it shall be settled between this country and other countries. We have had an instance of it within the past four years. We have had within the past four years a demand of the Japanese people that their young people shall be admitted to the white schools of California, and they claimed that they had that right under an existing treaty.

Mr. President, there is a question which would come up for arbitration, a question likely to come up for arbitration, a question which has heretofore been raised and which was settled without arbitration or rupture only by the most delicate diplomatic management, and one which in the absence of that diplomatic management would have led, possibly not to war, but to an interruption of the friendly relations between this country and Japan, a question which naturally Japan would have desired to settle by arbitration. And in such case the question is this: If Japan had come and demanded arbitration, and we were considering the question whether or not we would consent to arbitration in that case, would or would not the question whether we should arbitrate that question or whether we would settle it for ourselves without arbitration be the main question that the Senate would be called upon to pass upon? Could the question whether we would consent to arbitrate that question have been constitutionally delegated to an outside commission, clothed with power to determine for the Senate that it should consent to such arbitration even though the Senate was unwilling to arbitrate it and insisted that it was not a matter to be properly arbitrated? And yet if it be true that this provision in the third clause of the third article is one which would be obligatory upon the Senate, it is necessarily true that that question when referred to a board of inquiry is one which would have been settled by the board of inquiry in case the Senate was unwilling to do it, and in which we would have been compelled to go into an arbitration on that subject or else to have violated the treaty.

Now, Mr. President, another one, which is likely to occur. Senators scout the idea that the Monroe doctrine can ever be brought up as a matter of arbitration—the question of our right to plant ourselves upon it and demand that other nations shall respect it. I do not suppose that any nation is ever going to send its envoy to this country to insist that this question shall be arbitrated as an abstract or moot question, but occasions may arise when it will be a question in an arbitration that is not an abstract one.

Soon after I came into the Senate I witnessed a very remarkable scene in this Chamber when President Cleveland sent his message to the Senate in regard to the Venezuela matter. That was a case where Great Britain claimed a right to territory in Venezuela and was proceeding to enforce her claim. The United States had no property in the welfare of Venezuela. They had no alliance with Venezuela. The United States Government was not the suzerain of Venezuela. Except so far as it fell within the influence of the Monroe doctrine, the United States Government had nothing more to do with Venezuela than it had to do with England, and yet under the claim of a right to assert the Monroe doctrine, President Cleveland notified Great Britain that the United States would not consent that Great Britain should take this territory from Venezuela.

That, Mr. President, was a very peremptory assertion on the part of the President, and I am bound to say that I think it was only the moderation and conservatism of Lord Salisbury, who was then the Premier of Great Britain, which prevented a rupture between these two Governments. It was arranged in a way that it was practically arbitrated without challenging our right to assert the Monroe doctrine.

But suppose this proposed treaty had been in force then and Great Britain, with no spirit of concession and a determination to assert her title to that territory, had said to the Government of the United States, "We demand arbitration of that question. We demand arbitration of the question whether you have the right to interfere by reason of the Monroe doctrine which you invoke." Would not that have brought the question of the right of the United States Government to assert the Monroe doctrine directly within the province and jurisdiction of any court of arbitration that might have been secured for that purpose? And if we, Mr. President, had had presented to us at that day the question, with a demand on the part of Great Britain that that particular question which interfered with the assertion of her title should be arbitrated, to wit, the right of the United States Government to interpose on the ground of the assertion of the Monroe doctrine—if that had been the case, and there had been presented to the Senate the question, "Will you consent to arbitrate the right to assert the Monroe doctrine?" the main question would have been not what the terms of the arbitration should be, but the main question would have been, "Will the United States, after a hundred years of the assertion of this doctrine, submit that the right to assert it shall be arbitrated and determined by any court of arbitration?" If the main question in the proposition for arbitration which might have then been submitted, could the Senate constitutionally have submitted the determination of that main question to an outside commission?

Mr. President, I need not go further, except for the purpose of illustration. If this treaty had been in force, and we had determined that we would not submit to arbitration our right to assert the Monroe doctrine, we would, in making that decision, have declined to make a treaty for such arbitration. What next?

England would have then demanded that a court of inquiry should be arranged for, should be constituted to determine whether the Senate had decided that main question of arbitration or no arbitration properly. In such circumstances, if we parted with our power to decide that question and permitted that court of inquiry to decide it for us, whether we would arbitrate our right to assert the Monroe doctrine, we would be abdicating our power which the Constitution devolves upon us to determine, with other questions, that most important of all questions in the political policy of this Government.

I will not amplify that, but it has been insisted with so much earnestness that the question of the Monroe doctrine can not be brought into arbitration under these proposed treaties now being considered that I thought it well to make that illustration, not of a supposititious case, but of an actual historic occurrence of which we have already had the experience and in which we might have been brought, if these treaties had then been in existence, and if the demand had been made by Great Britain for a decision by this outside commission, to a direct consideration of the question whether or not in the assertion of the title of Great Britain to a part of Venezuela the United States had the right by reason of the assertion of the Monroe doctrine to undertake to interfere.

If it had been determined that the United States did not have the right to assert the Monroe doctrine for the purpose of preventing Great Britain from taking part of the territory of Venezuela, we would either have had to submit to that or go to war or submit to a permanent rupture of the friendly relations between ourselves and Great Britain.

In passing, I will say that did time permit I would say something more about the school question on the Pacific coast for the purpose of illustrating the course which this arbitration might take in such a case, having reference in mind to the attitude of the then President of the United States with respect to that question, in which it was his opinion that Japan did have the right to insist that Japanese youths had the right under our treaty with Japan to enter the white schools of California.

Now, Mr. President, I come to another question that is somewhat practical in its nature—as to the power of another Government to make a demand upon this Government on account of the claim of any of its citizens or subjects that they held bonds of one of the States of the United States which had matured and the payment of which was refused.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who urged that question with earnestness yesterday or made objection to the proposition, was not certain when I called attention to the fact that the proposed treaty does not limit questions which may be submitted to arbitration or submitted to the joint court of inquiry to those which are enumerated in the first article, but in the second article that scope is enlarged and is made to apply to all matters of difference. The joint high commission does not make any award at any time. The joint commission of inquiry has the power expressly conferred upon it not only to inquire concerning the matters enumerated in the first article, but also any other controversy hereafter arising between them, even if they are not agreed that it falls within the scope of article 1.

I want to come first to the question whether any demand can be made upon the United States on account of the indebtedness of a State—if the terms of the treaty are sufficiently broad to embrace all matters of difference between the United States and the countries with which we have treaties. It is true such indebtedness is not the debt of the United States, but it is also true that under our dual system of government it is the debt of one of our sovereignties, which sovereignty can not enter into direct relations with a foreign power and with which sovereignty no foreign sovereignty can enter into diplomatic relations by negotiations or otherwise. Can it be contended for a moment that when the Federal Government was formed, and the right of a State to enter into negotiations or diplomatic relations with a foreign State was prohibited and denied to it, when the entire power as to everything which relates to that State and a foreign Government, so far as negotiations were concerned or adjustments were concerned, either to be proposed or concluded, was delegated to the Federal Government, when the barrier has been erected around a State so that no foreign power can reach it, when we have even put in the Constitution in the eleventh amendment that no foreign citizen shall sue a State—can it be contended that the effect of that was forever to relieve a State from all obligations to foreign countries by reason of what might be done or undertaken to be done by a State, or to forever bar a foreign State from any possibility of having redress for anything that may happen to it or its citizens or subjects through a State of the United States?

Mr. President, that is a proposition which it seems to me impossible for anyone to conceive of as correct. The United States Government is clothed by the States with all power to deal as to any matter that concerns a State with a foreign Government, and the State is prohibited from dealing with any foreign Government except through the Federal Government. Not only so, but every foreign Government is barred from attempting to deal with a State, or attempting to seek redress from a State, on account of any obligation of any character whatsoever. The Federal Government has been clothed by the State, I repeat, with the jurisdiction or authority to represent it in all matters which concern it and a foreign Government; and yet if the contention is correct, that the United States can not be called to account for the action of a State, that arrangement would be one in which a State would be forever protected in any act which might concern a foreign nation or the subjects or citizens of a foreign nation. It would be forever and for all time panoplied and fortified, so that it might commit any act of injustice or deny any obligation and there would be no redress. Mr. President, it is an utter impossibility that such can be the case.

Now, it is another matter as to what would be the effect of an arbitration between the United States and a foreign Government in which it should be found that the State ought to pay the bonds. The Senator from Mississippi asked, How would the Federal Government enforce it? Mr. President, if the award of arbitrators were never enforced, if there were never an effort to enforce it, under the circumstances of the creation of these discredited bonds the subject is a matter, as was said by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], that concerns ourselves alone. It is a sealed book, which is forever shut up and closed. It is a political matter growing out of a time of great political disturbance—almost anarchy. The fundamental proposition upon which the Southern States base their refusal to pay these bonds is that they are not their bonds; that they did not make the bonds; that there were others in high places who had usurped authority for which they were in no manner responsible; and that they were not liable for their acts except in so far as they had received the benefit of those bonds.

As I have had occasion to say before, Mr. President, there are not simply safes and vaults full of these bonds; there are absolutely cords of them, which could be piled up like corded wood, to pay which would bankrupt the Southern States. It is a question that is ended. It is a question which has been ended not only to the satisfaction of the Southern people, but it has been ended to the satisfaction of the Northern people; and the evidence of it is that the credit of the Southern States is to-day practically as good as the credit of the Northern States upon the exchanges of the great metropolis of the North. I will ask my colleague what the bonds of the State of Georgia sell at. I have forgotten.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. About par, the 3 per cent and 4 per cent bonds. It depends on the length of time they run.

Mr. BACON. Above par?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The 3 per cent bonds sell at par.

Mr. BACON. My colleague, who has recently occupied the executive chair of my State, tells me that upon the exchange of New York a 3 per cent bond of the State of Georgia will sell at par, some variation being found according to the length of time it has to run.

But, I repeat, this question has been settled, not only to the satisfaction of the southern people, but it has been settled to the satisfaction of the Nation at large. It is regarded as a closed incident, and it matters not whether the result of such an arbitration should ever exact one dollar of payment from either one of those States; it is a matter we do not wish that any outside party should ever have the right to say to the Senate of the United States, you must arbitrate that. I have no fear; I would be willing that any southern Senator should sit silent and let the question come up before Senators from the North as to whether or not they would agree that the question of the liability of the States on those reconstruction bonds should be submitted to arbitration, and I am sure they would say no. When that question was submitted to them the most important question would be, Will you submit it to arbitration? not the terms of arbitration. Mr. President, that is distinctly a justiciable question. The Supreme Court of the United States has determined that the question of the liability of one of these State's government bonds is a justiciable question. If submitted to us we would say no. Submitted to a board of inquiry, they would say yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not think we would say the question was not justiciable. We would say it was a question not of difference between the United States Government and the people. Of course, the question is justiciable.

Mr. BACON. I have endeavored to go over that question with the Senator from Mississippi. He and I differ on that point. The Senator from Mississippi thinks that there can be no difference between a foreign country and the United States as to the claim of a citizen or subject of that foreign country against one of the United States. I hold that the Federal Government represents necessarily the State in such controversy and that it is a matter of difference between the Federal Government and the foreign Government. It may not be a debt of the Federal Government and is not a debt of the Federal Government, but when a demand is made upon the Federal Government to arbitrate that question the Federal Government could not reply, "It is the debt of a State and not the debt of the Federal Government," because the Federal Government represents the State in all the relations between that State and a foreign Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator from Georgia pardon one more interruption?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Georgia said the United States could not make that reply. I answer the United States has replied that way, and a joint mixed commission decided that the claim of the United States was correct.

Mr. BACON. I am going to come to that. I have the original article of agreement between the Government of the United States, and that was put upon a technicality, which I will come to a little later. I have the book right here and I shall try not to omit it.

Mr. President, that is not a dead question. I do not know this matter personally of which I am now to speak; I can not assert it personally; but I do assert it as a fact of which I am as confident as I am of anything else that I have not personal knowledge of that there is now in the State Department, or has been in the recent past, one or more demands or suggestions upon the part of foreign governments upon the Federal Government to take up this question of the bonds of the Southern States which were not paid. If I am wrong about that, I invite contradiction of it, not only here but elsewhere. I charge it, at the same time stating that I do not say it from personal knowledge, but I do it from confidence in the correctness of the statement, that there are to-day in the State Department, or have been recently, in Washington, the demands, actual or tentative, of foreign governments upon the Federal Government on account of the alleged indebtedness of these States on those repudiated bonds.

I have here a little clipping which has been handed to me by a brother Senator, which he cut out of a St. Louis paper, and which I will read. It is brief. It is not an old matter by any means. I have not the date, but it is very recent:

MISSISSIPPI STATE BONDS ISSUED TO PLANTERS' AND UNION BANKS.

The Corporation of Foreign Bondholders of London and Messrs. H. B. Hollins & Co., of New York, have consented to act as readjustment managers for the benefit of the holders of the above-described securities, who may deposit their bonds under the terms of an agreement provided for that purpose.

Copies of the documents will be furnished on application and temporary certificates will be issued in exchange for deposited securities. In the interest of the bondholders it is important that deposits be made within the next 30 days, and the readjustment managers do not undertake to adopt any action in reference to the above securities until they are empowered by a majority.

THE CORPORATION OF FOREIGN BONDHOLDERS, LONDON,

H. B. HOLLINS & CO., NEW YORK,

Readjustment Managers, London-New York.

EDWARD L. ANDREWS, Counsel.

Mr. President, those of us who have for some years past been engaged in the consideration of questions growing out of the condition of the Central American States and their indebtedness recognize these names signed to this advertisement. That is not a fictitious advertisement. They are people who deal in all these classes of discredited securities, and the very same men have come up here, or at least their names are found in these books, giving information concerning discredited bonds of various countries. I do not know that they have ever appeared before us, but they have been concerned in all these questions about the readjustment of the debts of the Central American States. It is not a myth; it is an active organization, and here they are advertising in the papers of the United States for these southern bonds for the purpose of making demands and claims. Can anyone doubt, if this treaty were ratified with this power given to this outside commission to determine what subjects shall be arbitrated, that there would be a speedy movement to arbitrate the question of the liability of these States to pay these hundreds of millions of fraudulent bonds.

I care not, Mr. President, whether it is possible to figure out in what way the State will ever be made to pay these bonds or not. I say this is a matter that we do not wish to open. We do not wish to be put in a position where, when the Senate says, as I know it would say, that it will not submit that question to arbitration, we can be compelled to say that it shall go to an outside commission, and that we shall have to abide by what that commission may say in regard to the question whether the question of the liability of my State or of another State shall or shall not be submitted to arbitration.

Mr. President, my friend the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] reminds me of a matter which possibly I might have overlooked but for his having done so, as I have certainly passed that part of the argument. He reminds me of the fact that foreign Governments have made demands upon the Federal Government not simply for the payment of contract obligations, but for the payment of damages on account of injuries inflicted upon its citizens. The Senator from Mississippi knows that fact. It occurred in a case from Louisiana and also in a case from Colorado, and possibly another; I am not sure. I was asking some Senator to-day whether any demand had ever been made on this Government on account of the slaughter of Chinese on the Pacific coast. As stated by the Senator from Arkansas, the Government of the United States did actually pay damages in the case of the demand on account of what occurred in Louisiana, and the Government of the United States did so in recognition of the fact that while it was not the act of the United States Government, while it was not an act on account of which the United States could as a Government be made responsible in money, it was the act of one who alone could be represented in negotiations between it and another Government by the authority of the United States. It was very generous on the part of the United States. It paid it, and has not exacted any repayment from the State. I presume if it had requested payment from the State the State would have paid it. The amount was not very large, and even if it be large, and in its power, the State would have recognized the fact that the Federal Government in that negotiation had represented it and had done the best for it it could. It would recognize the fact that if it were not a part of the Federal Government a demand would have been made upon Louisiana and not upon the Federal Government, and if an independent State it would have had to respond to that demand or stand the consequences, whatever they might be, even to the point of a rupture of friendly relations, and possibly war.

I have here a copy of the Platt amendment, a compliance with which we imposed on Cuba. I will remark that I possibly am consuming more time than I should in the details of this discussion, but I want to bring to the attention of the Senate as strongly as I can, in a practical way, the consideration and decision of the question whether the determination as to whether an arbitration shall or shall not be entered upon is an important part of the duty of assenting to a treaty providing for an arbitration. If it is, then we can not ourselves escape the responsibility of such assent and delegate it to some one else. To do so is to violate the command of the Constitution that before a treaty can be made the Senate by a two-thirds vote of those present must advise and consent to it.

I have here, Mr. President, the Platt amendment and also the declaration of war of the United States against Spain, in which there is incorporated the famous Teller resolution. At that time it was not known what was going to be the effect of a declaration of war against Spain. There was the gravest apprehension in Congress, and to my personal knowledge, from his own utterances made to me by the President of the United States that the act of the Congress in declaring war against Spain would be construed by the European Governments as a purpose to aggrandize the United States, to take a means to acquire the territory of Cuba for the benefit and advantage of the United States and for their enrichment. It was an important matter to disabuse the minds of European Governments of that suggestion. It was important to stand before the world with a solemn assertion that we entered upon that war not for aggrandizement nor for the enrichment of this country, but for the purpose of a great accomplishment, of terminating an intolerable condition in Cuba, and in the securing to that country of the peace and good order which would make it possible for this country to have it live by the side of us in such a way as would not be detrimental to the interests and the welfare of the United States.

For the purpose of setting ourselves in a position beyond criticism in that regard, when we broke the peace of world, in that most solemn of all solemn moments that can come to the Congress of the United States, we incorporated this resolution, known as the Teller amendment, in the declaration of war. I should have mentioned that this matter in regard to Cuba was brought up yesterday by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], and I am simply pursuing it a little further. After the other resolutions, the fourth is this:

That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination, when that is accomplished, to leave the government and control of the island to its people.

Now, Mr. President, we entered upon that war not knowing what would be its cost in blood and treasure; we entered upon that not knowing but that it would embroil us in war with all Europe; we entered upon it because of the great necessity that we should do so to terminate a condition at our doors which could not be longer tolerated; and yet, after the conclusion of that war, although we had made that pledge in its declaration, it was realized that we could not stand by that declaration. It was realized that we could not safely turn over that island to the unrestricted control of the people of Cuba, and that in order to insure that there should be in the future the continued condition of affairs for the accomplishment of which we had gone to war it was necessary to violate that pledge. While we did not violate it in spirit, so far as concerns practical autonomy for Cuba and so far as it relates to any effort to aggrandize ourselves was concerned, or to enrich the people and Government of the United States, so far from leaving that island to the control of its own people we did, in what is known as the Platt amendment, lay down the most stringent restrictions upon freedom of action by their Government. They are too long for me to read, but I may possibly, with the permission of the Senate, insert at least a part of them. In that Platt amendment there are eight requirements and restrictions made by the United States upon the Cuban people and their Government. I will read the first one, at least, because that is one which illustrates the fact that a serious question may be raised between Cuba and the United States, or it may be raised between a foreign Government interested in Cuba and the United States, on account of its inconsistency with the pledge in the Teller amendment. The first paragraph of the Platt amendment is this:

That the Government of Cuba shall never enter into any treaty or other compact with any foreign power or powers which will impair or tend to impair the independence of Cuba, nor in any manner authorize or permit any foreign power or powers to obtain, by colonization or for military or naval purposes or otherwise, lodgment in or control over any portion of said island.

Mr. President, there can be no question of the fact that that requirement, as well as the others that follow it, is in absolute violation of the pledge which the Government of the United States made when it declared war against Spain.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BACON. I will; but I had not finished the statement I intended to make in that regard. If the Senator will suspend for just a few moments, I will yield to him with pleasure a little later.

The application I want to make of that, Mr. President, is this: Cuba is an independent country in all respects, except so far as we exercise an authority which may be termed a suzerainty. She has her minister here; we have our minister there; she has ministers in all the courts of Europe, and the courts of Europe have their ministers in Cuba. So that, so far as autonomy goes, she is an independent country. It is an easy matter for Cuba to say that this restriction is in denial of the obligation which we imposed upon ourselves when we declared war against Spain, and to demand that she have the right to enter into treaties, such as are prohibited in the Platt amendment, or, what might be more practical, to sell to a foreign government a naval station on the island of Cuba. She might demand arbitration of that. She could demand it if she had a treaty with us. If that question came here after we had spent millions of dollars for the purpose of bringing about the present conditions in Cuba and for insuring the future—if that question came here and we were to refuse to arbitrate the question with her, she could, under the terms of such a treaty as that now before us, demand that it be referred to the outside commission to say whether we should yield to her demand and make an agreement of arbitration against our will. In thus permitting the outside commission to dictate to us under such circumstance that we should against our will agree to arbitrate with Cuba our right to enforce the Platt amendment, we would have abdicated the power and the duty and the obligation which the Constitution imposes upon us, that we shall advise and consent to a treaty in every part. The main question would have been, Will we arbitrate our right to control Cuba as to her permission to make a sale of a naval station to Great Britain or to France or to Germany or to Austria or to any other Government? The power to determine whether we would arbitrate that question we could not constitutionally delegate to an outside commission.

Mr. President, there is another class of cases that I think ought to appeal to Senators more strongly than the class I have already enumerated.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon. I now yield to him with pleasure.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, before the Senator from Georgia leaves the Cuban illustration, I desire to emphasize and put the question to the Senator from Georgia whether the close proximity of the Bahama Islands, in which England is directly interested, to Cuba and Cuba's condition were such as to jeopardize in any way the health or the prosperity of the Bahama Islands because of Cuba's inability to contract obligations beyond the limitations fixed by the United States—is not a question in which England would be directly interested? And, under the general power of clause 3 of article 3 of the treaty we are considering, could she not instantly put that question up to an international tribunal, to determine whether or not her interests were vital, without any consent whatever from us?

Mr. BACON. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan is entirely apt and furnishes another strong illustration of the principle for which I am contending.

I was about to say, Mr. President, that there is another class of questions which can be the subject of a demand for arbitration, which, it seems to me, would appeal still more strongly to Senators, especially to the two distinguished Senators who now sit in front of me and who are the advocates of this clause of the treaty—the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. I mention them because I have heard the same thing from each one of them as to the limitation of the power of the Government in making treaties, in which I fully agree with them both. The importance of the presentation I am about to make is emphasized by the fact that it is a question, Mr. President, upon which all lawyers are not agreed, as to how far the power of the Federal Government extends in the making of treaties under the Constitution of the United States.

For instance, in a work upon the treaty-making power of the United States, written by Mr. Charles Henry Butler, of New York, is found the following statement of his opinion and conclusions as to the extent of the power of the United States in making treaties, which is in direct conflict with the views entertained by myself and the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Mississippi:

First. That the treaty-making power of the United States, as vested in the central Government, is derived not only from the powers expressly conferred by the Constitution, but that it is also possessed by that Government as an attribute of sovereignty, and that it extends to every subject which can be the basis of negotiation and contract between any of the sovereign powers of the world, or in regard to which the several States of the Union themselves could have negotiated and contracted if the Constitution had not expressly prohibited the States from exercising the treaty-making power in any manner whatever and vested that power exclusively in and expressly delegated it to the Federal Government.

Second. That the power to legislate in regard to all matters affected by treaty stipulations and relations is coextensive with the treaty-making power, and that acts of Congress enforcing such stipulations which, in the absence of treaty stipulations, would be unconstitutional as infringing upon the powers reserved to the States, are constitutional, and can be enforced, even though they may conflict with State laws or provisions of State constitutions.

Third. That all provisions in State statutes or constitutions which in any way conflict with any treaty stipulations, whether they have been made prior or subsequent thereto, must give way to the provisions of the treaty, or act of Congress based on and enforcing the same, even if such provisions relate to matters wholly within State jurisdiction.

To these opinions and these conclusions the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Mississippi do not assent. From the standpoint of the Senator from Maryland or from the standpoint of the Senator from Mississippi and from my standpoint—and I think from the only correct standpoint—the Federal Government has no right to make a treaty except in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States. From my standpoint and from the standpoint of each of these honorable Senators, the Federal Government has no right to make a treaty which shall control the police powers of a State. The Supreme Court of the United States has determined solemnly that the police jurisdiction of a State is something which belongs to that State; that it does not acquire it from the Constitution of the United States; that it does not in any manner get it from the United States; but that it is a power which each State had before it entered into the covenant of the Constitution, and a power which it never surrendered, and therefore a power which belongs to it by the most sacred of all titles.

But, Mr. President, suppose a question should arise between this Government and a foreign Government, and a difference grew out of it which should involve the right of the Federal Government to control police powers in the interest of the foreign Government; suppose, as in the case of the schools in California, under a treaty already existing a foreign government—the Government of Japan in that instance invoked the existing treaty, and said that under that treaty guaranteeing to its citizens certain rights in this country, they had the right to enter into the public schools of California our reply would be this: That can not be so, because the treaty can not be construed to apply to that which is beyond the constitutional powers of the United States; being beyond the constitutional power of the United States, the United States never had that in contemplation and could not if it would give that right to Japan by treaty. There is in consequence no such obligation on the part of the United States to enforce under that treaty the right of Japanese youths to go into the white schools of California. Suppose that question comes here and the President of the United States believes who sends it here, as the then President of the United States did believe, that under the treaty with Japan the question of the right of a Japanese youth to go into a school in California was involved and included. Suppose the President of the United States sends a proposed treaty for the purpose of arbitrating that question and the Senate of the United States refuses to arbitrate it, declines to arbitrate it. It goes, under the terms of such a treaty as that now pending, to the court of inquiry. There is nothing in the proposed treaties which limits the question of difference to the executives. It also embraces differences in which the Senate may be a party. The treaty with Japan providing for arbitration comes to the Senate and the Senate says: "No; we do not consider that a justiciable question; we do not consider that under the Constitution of the United States there can be any such interpretation of that treaty as will justify an arbitration of the right of Japanese youths to enter the California schools."

The other Government says, "That being so, we demand that that question go to the joint high commission of inquiry," and the joint high commission, agreeing with the view expressed by Mr. Butler, which I have quoted, determines that it is within the power of the Federal Government to make a treaty which shall admit Japanese students into the white schools of California, and that the Senate should agree to arbitrate the question, and it comes back here. Now, the case of the Senator from Mississippi and the case of the Senator from Maryland are somewhat different, because the Senator from Mississippi says that we are not bound by that conclusion of the commission, while the Senator from Maryland says that we are. It comes back here, under the opinion of the Senator from Maryland, with a conclusive obligatory finding on the part of this outside commission. Has the Senator from Maryland, or any other Senator who thinks that way, the right to say that he will yield his judgment as to a constitutional power of the Federal Government in the making of a treaty affecting the schools of a State because the joint high commission decides that the Federal Government has that power? No, Mr. President; the Senator from Maryland would not do so; but, according to the logic of his case, he would have it to do or break the obligation of the treaty to abide by the judgment of this outside commission.

The Senator from Mississippi does not go so far as the Senator from Maryland in that particular. The Senator from Maryland says that it would be of binding obligation; and I am going to read his language here from this report, which is a very strong statement of the question and expresses my views exactly. The Senator from Mississippi says, however, that there would not be a legal obligation, but a moral obligation.

Mr. President, I want to ask one question: If there is a moral obligation, upon what must that moral obligation rest? If there is a moral obligation, it must rest upon the fact that there is an agreement on the part of the United States that the Senate shall and will be bound by the finding of the outside commission as provided in the treaty; because, if there is no such agreement, there is no moral obligation, and if there is such an agreement in the treaty, it is not a moral obligation but a legal obligation. Is there any escape from that proposition? But if we assume that it is a moral obligation, can a man undertake a moral obligation to do that which is unconstitutional, knowing in advance that his agreement may call on him to do that which he believes to be unconstitutional? If it is a moral obligation, it is one that he is not at liberty to disregard. If he has invested that high commission with the power to find a conclusion which will devolve upon him a moral obligation to obey it, how can he say, "I will obey it when I think it is proper, and I will disregard it when I do not think it is proper"? If it is a moral obligation, Mr. President, it is to carry out the command of that commission. And, as there is no way to enforce obedience to the obligation, a moral obligation is as binding as a legal obligation.

But, Mr. President, I feel that I have delayed too long on these illustrations of the practical working of these proposed treaties, and I am going to hurry on, because I wish to present some other matters in connection with this question. In passing, I will say this: The Senators admit that, so far as the subjects excepted in what we know as the Root treaties of 1908 are concerned, namely, honor, vital interests, and independence, while those exceptions are eliminated from this treaty they are subjects which no Senate would consent to arbitrate. Therefore, Mr. President, the fact that they are not excepted in the pending treaties does not in any manner change their effect and application from the treaties that now exist. I will simply pass it with this question: If any question affecting the honor or the vital interests or the independence of this country should be presented to the Senate and a demand should be made upon the Senate for arbitration, would not the main question be, Shall we or shall we not arbitrate it? Being the main question, there is no possibility that we can escape the conclusion that it is a part of the obligation imposed upon the Senate to advise and consent to the making of the treaty. So grave a question can not be constitutionally determined by embracing them in a treaty at the dictation of an outside commission.

Mr. President, passing from that, those who are I think somewhat shocked at the conclusion with which they are confronted when it is contended in their presence that to carry out the third clause of the third article as an obligatory clause would put the Senate of the United States in a condition which it could not possibly consent to occupy, take refuge in the construction that the third clause of the third article does not impose any obligation. I want right in that particular to call attention to a very remarkable fact, that of all the Senators who advocate these treaties in their present form, no two of them agree in the construction of that third clause, or, at least, no two of them agree in the construction and also in the application of it. Perhaps I ought to make an exception in the case of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] and the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], because they did join in the same report, and therefore they do agree. I want to say, however, in regard to that, that while the Senator from New York, who I understand and am informed wrote that report, and the Senator from Illinois agree in the report, they differ very widely in the application of the third clause of article 3 from other Senators who have expressed their approval of this clause in the treaty. The Senator from New York, after what might be called a very moderate defense of the treaty, proceeds to point out its fatal defects. The Senator from New York smiles when I say "moderate." We know that the Senator from New York does not generally make moderate arguments, especially on law questions. If I had made this argument, I would probably speak of it in some other language than as a "moderate argument," but I suppose that is the least depreciating designation that I can give to it when made by the Senator from New York, and, knowing the fertility of resource of the Senator from New York, I am compelled to say that I do not think he would have made so moderate an argument but for the delicacy of the position in which he is placed, which requires him to show consideration for his successor in the high office of Secretary of State.

On page 9 of this pamphlet, Senate Document No. 98, is found the report of the Senator from New York and the Senator from Illinois. After having made this argument, which I am still content to call "an argument," sustaining this treaty in its present form—I will say it is not only a moderate argument, but a very short argument, being less than a page—it goes on to say this:

The real objection to the clause which commits to the proposed joint commission questions whether particular controversies are arbitrable is not that the commission will determine whether the particular case comes within a known line, but that the commission, under the general language of the first article, may draw the line to suit themselves instead of observing a line drawn by the treaty-making power. If we thought this could not be avoided without amending the treaty, we would vote for the amendment to strike out the last clause of article 3, for it is clearly the duty of the treaty-making power, including the Senate as well as the President, to draw that line, and that duty can not be delegated to a commission.

And then it goes on to suggest a clause which shall be attached to the treaty, and that clause, suggested in this report, is this:

Such a clause may well be, in substance, as follows:

The Senate advises and consents to the ratification of the said treaty with the understanding, to be made a part of such ratification, that the treaty does not authorize the submission to arbitration of any question which depends upon or involves the maintenance of the traditional attitude of the United States concerning American questions, or other purely governmental policy.

There is no possible contention on the part of the Senators from New York and Illinois, who join in this report, that there is any language in this treaty with reference to those subjects—"the traditional attitude of the United States concerning American questions or other purely governmental policy"—but the Senators recognize the fact that in leaving open such a question it is fatally defective and should be cured by a resolution of ratification which would except those particular subjects. We might say that there are a great many other subjects which might be excepted. Why limit it to them?

Mr. President, I am not going to stop at showing the difference in the case of the Senators from New York and Illinois, but as to others the fact of the business is that every Senator who favors these treaties stands on a different side in regard to the treaties, if not directly in opposition on the legal question, directly upon the question of how far that clause will extend in its application to any treaty which may be invoked hereafter.

In the case of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] there is distinctly the argument on his part that the third clause does not impose upon the Senate any obligation, and that when the award of that commission came back to the Senate we would stand in exactly the same position as if the matter had been submitted to us directly by the President without going to a commission. That is the contention of the Senator from Ohio.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] makes practically the same argument, but he goes further than the Senator from Ohio. The Senator from North Dakota says that the effect of that part of the treaty—the third clause—is not to control the Senate; that it has no effect upon the Senate, but it is compulsory in its effect upon the President. That is the position of the Senator from North Dakota, that all of this contention, all of this propaganda, all of this agitation among the people are to compel the President to submit a matter to the Senate.

The Senator from North Dakota in his speech said, in response to an inquiry made by me, that under this proposed treaty nothing could be submitted to arbitration that could not be submitted under the existing treaties. Therefore not only is the scope of the treaties not enlarged, but the entire effect of it, while not enlarging the scope of the treaties, is to lay a compulsion upon the President of the United States. The Senator said:

It compels the President to take the initiatory steps so that it may be considered by the treaty-making power. That is all I claim it means and nothing more.

In this construction the Senator from North Dakota is in line with all the other Senators who favor this objectionable third clause of the third article to the extent that neither one of them agrees with any of the others as to the proper construction and application of the clause.

And then further on the Senator from North Dakota, in his speech favoring the treaties, says:

That it leaves for the Senate exactly the same powers and authority that the Senate would exercise if the President, of his own motion and without the act of the joint commission, had submitted the case to arbitration.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], on the contrary, in a very forceful expression of it in his report, which he sustained in his argument before the Senate, uses this language. After quoting what had been said by the Senator from Ohio in regard to the proper construction of the third clause of the third article, he says this:

I regret sincerely that, after the most patient reflection upon the subject, I can not possibly reach this conclusion—

That is, that it left the Senate with the same power as it was before the outside commission made its decision—

The lawyers of the committee and eminent lawyers outside of the committee who have examined the treaty are at odds and at variance upon the proper construction of article 1 and article 3. I might ask what is the use of referring it to a joint high commission for a decision if its decision is not binding and can be repudiated by the Senate. It is all very well to say that it is practically impossible that the Senate would ever have occasion to refuse its approval of the arbitration of a question which the commission of inquiry had reported to be within the scope of article 1. The Senate, however, has the power to refuse its approval and it has the unlimited power so to do, as Senator BURTON admits, according to his interpretation of the treaty, and to my mind the prime object and intention of the treaty was not to confer this power upon the Senate but to make the decision of the commission decisive and final.

Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Maryland in this construction. I do not see how it is possible for anyone to come to any other conclusion in regard to that matter. And yet it is true that in reaching that conclusion without any qualification, the Senator again presents the case of differing in part at least from the other Senators who favor this third clause.

No two of them entirely agree. The Senator from Maryland in a speech in the Senate spoke of this treaty—

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. RAYNER. Does not the Senator think it was the intention of the parties who drew this treaty to make the decision binding?

Mr. BACON. I do most absolutely and without any possible qualification.

Mr. RAYNER. So do I.

Mr. BACON. It does not mean anything if it does not mean that. It has no place here if it does not mean that. Let me read you the corresponding clause in The Hague convention from which all this provision is taken, except that particular part which is added and embodied in this third clause. This treaty, I say, has in it less that is original than any paper that ever came to the Senate of the United States. It is taken bodily from The Hague convention and from what are known as the Root treaties. I say "taken bodily"; there is a difference of phraseology between these treaties and the Root treaties; there is a difference in terms; but according to Senators themselves those terms, when put into practical operation, will mean nothing more than the present treaties mean; for these Senators say that questions of national honor, vital interests, governmental policies, and so forth, are not justiciable, and would not, therefore, be arbitrable under the proposed treaties. If such questions are not justiciable then the enlargement of the scope of arbitration in these proposed treaties, in omitting the exceptions of honor, vital interests, and the independence of the country as now found in the Root treaties, is meaningless, and there is practically nothing new in them excepting this provision for this outside commission, perhaps of foreigners, to determine for the Senate when it shall or shall not arbitrate questions affecting the most important interests of the Government and people of the United States.

I could go through these treaties and take them up clause by clause, and I could refer to The Hague convention and the Root treaties, 25 in number, and all of which are now in force, and I could find in either The Hague convention or the Root treaties substantially the same provisions, with some slight variations, that are found in this treaty. Even the one which the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] dwelt upon with so much earnestness yesterday, as to allowing cooling time, is found in The Hague convention, and found in a more direct and practical provision than it is here. It does not say anything else except that when a demand is made for reference of a question to this outside commission a party may wait a given period before it agrees to the reference. I will read the exact words so as not to misrepresent it:

Provided, however, That such reference may be postponed until the expiration of one year.

There is nothing about any negotiations between the parties for arbitration in the meantime. That same principle is found in The Hague convention with a further provision for the selection of outside powers, who shall in the meantime try to adjust the matter between the different parties. It makes it a superior provision really to that which is found in this treaty.

Mr. President, I was about to say that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] was not enamored with this treaty, except as to the purpose to be accomplished, and the purpose to be accomplished is already accomplished in a much better way by treaties that now exist and by The Hague Convention. I recollect the picturesque language which the Senator from Maryland used when he was discussing these treaties before the Senate. I turned to the RECORD for the purpose of finding it, and I was disappointed in not finding the language used when the Senator discussed it in the Senate. The Senator read his speech, but at the same time he ornamented it with interjected extemporaneous remarks, and those remarks I refer to were extemporaneous comments and criticisms which do not appear in the RECORD. Only the written speech was, I presume, printed. But even what was written is strong enough. He says:

With profound respect and admiration for our great Secretary of State, who occupies a foremost place upon the field of law and of diplomacy, I am not fascinated with the phraseology of this instrument.

The Senator used some very much more picturesque language than that when he addressed the Senate, but I want to say that that even is a sufficiently severe criticism of it, because, if you take out of this treaty the third clause of the third article and then eliminate from it everything which it has gotten either from The Hague treaty or the Root treaties, there is, under the construction put upon it by its friends, nothing but phraseology in it, and that does not meet with the approval of the Senator from Maryland.

The Senator from California [Mr. WORKS], when he was discussing these treaties the ratification of which he favors in their present form and without amendment, used language which, read from the report of his speech, is found in the RECORD:

But, Mr. President, I can not but confess my disappointment that these proposed treaties, if ratified, will be so ineffectual as a means of meeting this sentiment. Very few of the thousands of people who are calling upon Senators to support the treaties really know their contents, and but few of those who know their contents understand their meaning and effect. They are so uncertain in their terms and so inadequate in expression that even on this floor the official representatives of our Government differ widely as to their scope, meaning, and effect.

Sir, I appeal to the experience of Senators—was there ever a treaty or other official document in the Senate so cuffed and buffeted by its friends, or by conflicting constructions so discredited by its advocates!

Yet, Mr. President, with no two Senators who advocate this treaty agreeing as to the meaning of the language and as to the extent of its application and as to the construction of it and with their condemnation of it as a literary production, we are asked to ratify it in its present form. And this is the demand in such circumstances for the ratification of a treaty which is to be invoked by foreign nations for the final settlement of the gravest and most important questions of difference which they may have with the United States.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. RAYNER. I think I can safely say that the Senator from New York agrees with me in my construction of the treaty—that the decision is morally binding, not legally binding.

Mr. BACON. The Senator did not say "morally." The Senator said "legally."

Mr. RAYNER. If there is any such word in the RECORD, I never said it. I do not suppose the Senator will do me the injustice of saying that anything can be legally binding on the Senate. Nothing can be legally binding unless you can enforce the right. I have said over and over again that it is binding; that it is a moral obligation, but that it is not legally binding, and that there is no way of legally enforcing it.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President—

Mr. RAYNER. Just give me a moment.

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator from New York will say whether I am wrong or not, but I think he and I agree entirely on the construction of this part of the treaty—that it is morally binding on the Senate.

Mr. BACON. In the same way the Senator would say that the Constitution of the United States is not legally binding on the Senate because its provisions can not be enforced on Senators.

Mr. BAILEY. I doubt that in some cases.

Mr. RAYNER. The Constitution of the United States can always be enforced. The courts will always enforce the Constitution of the United States, but no man would stand up and say that there is anything legally binding on the Senate. Wherever there is a legal right there is a legal remedy. I never contended for a moment, nor did the Senator from New York, that there is a legal way to enforce this against the Senate. I go on and say that the Senate need not obey the mandate, just as the Senator from Ohio says, although the Senator from Ohio and I differ on the construction of the treaty. The Senator from Georgia is right about that.

Mr. BACON. There is not a single command laid by the Constitution of the United States on the Senator from Maryland as a Senator that can be enforced by a court.

Mr. RAYNER. I should like to know some of the obligations that the Constitution lays upon me as a Senator. I am here under the sanction of an oath.

Mr. BACON. Of course.

Mr. RAYNER. I should like to know what obligation the Constitution of the United States lays upon me as a Senator. It lays it upon Congress; it does not lay it upon me individually; and if it lays upon the Congress of the United States the mandate that we shall not pass unconstitutional laws, and if we pass an unconstitutional law the Supreme Court would set it aside unless ex-President Roosevelt recalls it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the last proviso is a very important one. The contention of the Senator is that it does not impose a legal obligation on the Senate because it can not be enforced, but that it is a moral obligation. Everything that is a law is a legal obligation, whether it is accompanied by a penalty or not for its nonobservance. But the language of the Senator himself, which I have already read and which I will read again, is the best answer to the Senator's present position.

Here is what the Senator said in his carefully written report, as a minority of the Foreign Relations Committee, not an address in which there might have been the accidental use of unguarded words, but in his written report the Senator said—I shall now read. The Senator was commenting upon the position taken by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] that the report of the outside commission was not binding on the Senate, and he then used this language, which I read from the report of the Senator from Maryland.

Now, listen. This is on the question whether it is a legal or a moral obligation:

I regret sincerely that, after the most patient reflection upon the subject, I can not possibly reach this conclusion. The lawyers of the committee and eminent lawyers outside of the committee who have examined the treaty are at odds and at variance upon the proper construction of article 1 and article 3. I might ask what is the use of referring it to a joint high commission for a decision if its decision is not binding and can be repudiated by the Senate. It is all very well to say that it is practically impossible that the Senate would ever have occasion to refuse its approval of the arbitration of a question which the commission of inquiry had reported to be within the scope of article 1. The Senate, however, has the power to refuse its approval and it has the unlimited power so to do, as Senator BURTON admits, according to his interpretation of the treaty, and to my mind the prime object and intention of the treaty was not to confer this power upon the Senate, but to make the decision of the commission decisive and final.

If that is not the recognition of a legal effect of the conferring of this power upon the joint commission, I am not able to understand language, and I confess that the Senator from Maryland has expressed it very much more forcibly than I could express it myself.

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator from Georgia will not find in that speech or in the minority report anything like the word legal. I would not stand up before the Senate nor would any other lawyer in this body stand before the Senate and say legally binding. I do not take back one single word on that. That is my position now. It is that if one of the parties to the controversy has a right to set aside the award of the umpire, then you might as well strike this last clause of article 3 from the treaty. I think it is perfectly absurd to bring in that clause and then give one of the parties to the controversy the right to override the judgment of the umpire. I have never changed my opinion about that.

Mr. BAILEY. I have changed my vote.

Mr. RAYNER. I do not know how the Senator is going to vote. He has never stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. BAILEY. I really did not think it was material how I was going to vote, because I know very little about these international questions, and I generally follow the Democratic membership of that committee. I want to say, however, I was anxious to vote for this treaty, but if the finding of this joint high commission is to be binding upon my conscience, I intend to vote against it, and the Senator from Maryland has convinced me that I ought to do it.

Mr. RAYNER. From the Senator's standpoint I think he is right, but I am willing to abide by the finding. I do not know that there will be many votes with me in the Senate on that question. If there will not be any, I will stand alone on it. I am willing to vote that the decision of the commission shall be binding. I am willing to so vote, because I do not believe for a moment that any of these questions that have been so forcibly argued to-day will come within the jurisdiction of the commission. I have said that, and what is the use of going over the whole question again?

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator from Georgia will just permit me, if we could invoke the Constitution against a Senator, I would hale the Senator from Maryland into court on that very proposition, and I would ask an injunction to restrain him from such conduct.

Mr. RAYNER. Why does not the Senator from Texas answer some other proposition?

Mr. BAILEY. Because I do not understand the question.

Mr. RAYNER. But the Senator understands every question. There is no legal question the Senator does not understand. If the Senator could have answered it, he would have answered it long before. It is not from any want of understanding. I will guarantee that any legal question which comes up in the Senate is fully understood by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. I am not affecting modesty; that is not my habit; sometimes, probably, it would become me better if I did, but I am perfectly sincere when I say that I have not looked into a book upon international law since I left the law school where I studied Vattel on the Law of Nations. I never was very much interested in a science that had no final tribunal to decide it, and I never took much interest in a judgment that had to be collected across the bow of a battleship.

Mr. BACON. As suggested by my colleague, the finding or decision of the joint commission, if it is obligatory, is just as much a legal obligation as the finding of a board of arbitration would be. To say there is no power except the cannon and sword of the other party to enforce the judgment of an international award of arbitration does not relieve it of the fact that it is a legal obligation on the nation which is a party to it when found by that board of arbitration.

There is no dispute about the proposition that if the finding of an international board of arbitration is a legal obligation when the award comes in, it is a legal obligation upon the Nation because we have agreed to abide by the award; and when the finding or decision from the joint commission comes in and we have agreed to abide by the decision of that commission and to act in accordance with its findings, it is also a legal obligation. There is no escape from the proposition.

The Senator from Maryland says that no lawyer would think the other way. I am sorry to be put out of the pale.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I was rather inclined to look at that provision as analogous to the report of a referee to a court, where it would bind the court unless upon examination the court thought the referee was mistaken; and I had supposed the Senate would have the same right to reject the report of a joint high commission that a court would have to reject the report of its referee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And also, if the Senator from Georgia will pardon me, if the Senate found the commission had gone clear beyond the scope of the authority conferred upon the commission itself in the treaty.

Mr. BACON. The difference between the case of a referee and this commission is that the referee does not have any final judgment. He makes always a finding subject to the approval of the court.

Let me read to the Senate some things which will show what this clause means there in article 3. Article 3 is taken substantially from a clause in The Hague convention. I will have to read two articles from The Hague convention together, although one is numbered 9 and the other 35. They relate to the same subjects and the same international commission of inquiry. In The Hague convention there is found this language:

ARTICLE 9.

In disputes of an international nature involving neither honor nor vital interests, and arising from a difference of opinion on points of fact, the contracting powers deem it expedient and desirable that the parties who have not been able to come to an agreement by means of diplomacy, should, as far as circumstances allow, institute an international commission of inquiry, to facilitate a solution of these disputes by elucidating the facts by means of an impartial and conscientious investigation.

Then it says:

ARTICLE 35.

The report of the commission is limited to a statement of facts, and has in no way the character of an award. It leaves to the parties entire freedom as to the effect to be given to the statement.

When the framers of this treaty came to frame this particular article 3, which we recognize is taken from that part of The Hague treaty, they left out certain words and put in others, and there would have been no other purpose in doing so but to change the meaning of those words in the convention. In The Hague convention it is left to the decision of the parties—that is, to the nations interested—after this board or commission has made its recommendation. But now let me read article 3, which Senators will recognize from its resemblance is taken from The Hague convention:

ARTICLE 3.

The joint high commission of inquiry, instituted in each case as provided for in article 2—

I will not read article 2; it follows specifically the provisions in The Hague convention—is authorized to examine into and report upon the particular questions or matters referred to it, for the purpose of facilitating the solution of disputes by elucidating the facts, and to define the issues presented by such questions, and also to include in its report such recommendations and conclusions as may be appropriate.

The reports of the commission shall not be regarded as decisions of the questions or matters so submitted either on the facts or on the law and shall in no way have the character of an arbitral award.

Now, that far it is an exact copy, almost, except in variation of language, of that Hague treaty provision. But it did not stop there. It goes on, and here comes the objectionable clause:

It is further agreed, however—

What does "however" mean there but "nevertheless"?

It is further agreed, however, that in cases in which the parties disagree as to whether or not a difference is subject to arbitration under article 1 of this treaty, that question shall be submitted to the joint high commission of inquiry; and if all or all but one of the members of the commission agree and report that such difference is within the scope of article 1, it shall be referred to arbitration in accordance with the provisions of this treaty.

Except to give this outside commission a power that it would not have under the terms of The Hague convention, there could have been no possible purpose in adding that clause and in changing the provisions of The Hague convention. If there was no purpose to give it any other power, the treaty before us would have stopped before it reached that third clause. It would not have said "nevertheless" or "however," which is the same thing. Although the decision of the commission shall not have the effect of an award, still if there is a difference between the parties it shall be referred to the commission, and if they decide it a certain way, then that decision shall be final and the case shall go to arbitration. I see no possible escape from that.

Mr. McLEAN. May I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BACON. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. McLEAN. What is the fundamental objection to the use of language in the resolution of ratification which a Senator of ordinary intelligence, like myself, may understand? It seems to me that this treaty comes from its very first test from the Committee on Foreign Relations with three, and perhaps four, separate and distinct interpretations. I may agree with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge]; others agree with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Bacon]; and others agree with the Senator from New York [Mr. Root]. We may all be wrong; we can not very well all be right. What sort of a specific are we sending out to the world as a preventive of international troubles, when our own experts, our own chemists, can not tell us whether the prescription is composed of guncotton or asbestos?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I want to get through just as soon as I can, because I have been on the floor longer than I expected and longer than I would have been but for the interruptions, which, of course, I welcome and am glad to have. I will endeavor to call attention briefly to an amendment which I think ought to be made. I want to call attention to one or two other matters before I close.

One very particular contention has been made and that is that even if the decision of the commission is final and is to decide whether a question is or is not justiciable and must be given to arbitration by the Senate, that nevertheless would not be a delegation of the power of the Senate. In support of that we are cited to the legislation in the Interstate Commerce Commission act, by which a rule is laid down and certain parties are empowered to determine when that rule calls for certain action, such as seeing that railroad rates are reasonable, and so forth.

I want to reply to that. There are several replies to it. In the first place, Mr. President, the rule with reference to legislation can not properly be applied to a rule with reference to the Senate so far as they are exercising the treaty-making power. The Senate is in the performance of a peculiar function. It is not the performance of a function in which simply the majority of the Senate is authorized to act, but it requires two-thirds. I could pursue that argument further, but I will not on account of the lack of time. There is a great difference between the making of a treaty and the making of a statute law, which I am sure Senators will recognize without my consuming too much time in its elaboration or discussion. The cases such as the interstate-commerce law are not analogous to the proposed delegation of power proposed here. In the first place, in every case of that kind where Congress passes a law and prescribes a rule and then appoints a person who is to determine when the law shall go into effect, because that is what it amounts to practically, it prescribes some one who is an officer of the Government. It is an impossibility to conceive of a case where the Government would pass a law and prescribe a rule by which it should determine whether the law should go into effect and authorize a private citizen or a foreigner or anyone else who was not an officer of the Government to put that law into operation. That of itself is sufficient and fatal to the suggestion to my mind. But that is not all.

What do we do when we take the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission? What do we do when we say the Interstate Commerce Commission shall make regulations which are reasonable and just, and prescribing other tests? We prescribe a rule as to what others shall do. We prescribe a rule and appoint others to do it who are under our control. We prescribe a rule that we can at any time withdraw. We prescribe a rule which we can oversee and change. We prescribe a rule which we can at any time nullify. In other words, we are prescribing a rule which must be obeyed by the party to whom the authority is given.

What do we do in this case? We are prescribing a rule by which a commission shall say to us what we shall do. We are not prescribing a rule by which outside parties shall carry out a law under our direction, but we prescribe a rule and give the outside commission the authority to say to us what we shall do. Is that a similar case? By no means. It is as if in the performing the constitutional function of legislation we should create an outside legislative commission, composed in part or possibly in whole of foreigners, with power to finally determine for Congress whether any proposed legislation is reasonable and just, with a provision that when this commission decided that any proposed legislation is reasonable and just, then Congress should enact it as law, even though Congress did not approve it. That would not only be manifestly unconstitutional, but utterly absurd.

That is not all, Mr. President. If Senators would pursue their argument to its legitimate conclusion they would have to say that Congress could simply pass a law appointing a commission which should make all laws which are necessary and reasonable and just for the Government of the United States, and thereupon for Congress to adjourn. If that rule is a legitimate rule, if we can say in the exercise of the high power of making treaties that other parties shall without limitation determine when we shall make a treaty, we have an equal right in legislation to appoint a commission and say that that commission shall determine what laws shall be made, provided they are reasonable and just.

The Constitution says that an act of Congress shall be the supreme law of the land. It says again that a treaty shall also be the supreme law of the land. One is as high and authoritative as the other, and the constitutional requirements as to how the one shall be enacted is no more explicit and imperative in the case of passing law by Congress than it is in the case of making treaties by the President and the Senate.

They have a commission of that kind in Mexico. They have a legislative commission that, in the time of a vacation of the Congress, absolutely passes laws and they are decreed by the President as the legislative laws of the country. In the passage of such a law as the interstate-commerce law it is a question not indefinite and unlimited in its powers. The power is not an unlimited one in its application. Such a law is only passed where it is necessary, where in the nature of things the end can be accomplished in no other way. It is only justified under those circumstances, and it is limited strictly to that.

Now, for an illustration. It is impossible for Congress to prescribe all the rules which shall regulate railroads. It is impossible for Congress to prescribe the rules which shall insure rates which shall be reasonable and just and which shall maintain competition. It is practically impossible. Congress is compelled to adopt such measures and such agencies as will enable it to accomplish that very necessary purpose and design.

Therefore, it is that a commission, such as the Interstate Commerce Commission, is appointed, and it is limited in its powers and duties to those things which in the nature of things it is impossible for Congress itself to do. It is impossible for Congress to make in detail these regulations, and it therefore prescribes a rule for the regulations and appoints a commission to carry it out.

If it be true that in the making of a treaty we can prescribe a rule by which an outside commission will determine when a treaty shall be made, then also when we come to give our advice and consent to the appointment of an officer of the United States, we could with equal right appoint an outside commission which shall have power when the President of the United States sends to the Senate the nomination of a person for an office, to say that the nominee shall be confirmed because he is a fit and proper person for the office, and to make that decision by the commission binding upon the Senate.

There is no stronger obligation upon the Senate to exercise every particle of the function of advising and consenting in the confirmation of an officer nominated for office than there is in the function of the Senate in advising and consenting as to every part of a treaty whether it shall or shall not be assented to.

Mr. President, I could elaborate that and give further illustrations, but I have gone so far that I feel I must upon this presentation leave these things for the consideration of Senators in the suggestions which will come to them without further elaborations from me.

But I want to read an authority on the subject of the reason on which such legislation as the interstate-commerce law is based and justified.

I am not basing that upon my individual opinion. That question has been before the Supreme Court. I ask the attention of Senators to the rule of the Supreme Court on that subject. It lays down the rule and gives the reason. It is not an unlimited power on the part of Congress to prescribe a rule and have somebody else make the law. It is limited to cases of necessity. It is limited to cases where there is no other practical way to accomplish a result that it is important and necessary to accomplish in that particular.

I read from the case of Buttfield v. Stranahan, One hundred and ninety-second United States Reports, a report which was given to me by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. I take some gratification in the fact that I had suggested to him that on general principles that was necessarily the rule, and he said to me that there had been a decision of the Supreme Court to that effect, and he sent for a copy of the volume containing it, and here it is. In discussing this question of the delegation of power, what is a delegation and what is not a delegation of legislative power, the court says:

We may say of the legislation in this case, as was said of the legislation considered in Field v. Clark, that it does not, in any real sense, invest administrative officials with the power of legislation. Congress legislated on the subject as far as was reasonably practicable, and from the necessities of the case was compelled to leave to executive officials the duty of bringing about the result pointed out by a statute.

That is the only ground upon which it can be rested. Does anybody contend for a moment that there is any possible inability on the part of the Senate to itself deal with the question whether or not they will, in an important case, submit a matter to arbitration or whether a demand for arbitration falls within a treaty already made? None whatever.

Now, Mr. President, one word as to these amendments. I had promised the Senator from Connecticut that I would say what I thought was a proper amendment in this case. To my mind the proper thing to do is to strike out clause 3 of article 3. Do that, and I presume the Senate will be almost unanimous in the adoption of these treaties.

I want to say that in giving my vote for this with that stricken out, which I will do, I would do it not because I think these treaties are essential or that they are important or that they advance the cause of peace or the opportunity for arbitration. We have now The Hague convention, which has been entered into by 45 governments of the earth. We have in that Hague convention the most elaborate provisions for arbitration. This proposed treaty, so far as its practical operation is concerned, depends almost entirely upon The Hague convention, just as the Root treaties did.

I hold in my hand here 25 treaties made by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOR] when he was Secretary of State, in which there is a solemn covenant on the part of the United States with each one of these 25 nations—all the leading nations of the world, excepting Germany, and many of the minor nations. In all of these arbitration treaties there is a pledge to refer to arbitration all international differences, such as we are at all likely ever to submit to arbitration, and that we will use the National Court of Arbitration at The Hague for the purposes of such international arbitration.

Mr. President, I am going to read one of those treaties. They are all alike and in the same language. I think they are far superior to the treaty that is before us. I am going to read it just to show you the conciseness and clearness and sufficiency of those treaties. I think it is greatly to the honor of the Senator from New York that when he was Secretary of State he negotiated more treaties of general arbitration than all the other treaties of general arbitration put together since the foundation of the Government. They are all in identical language, and there are 25 of them. Now, without the preliminary part, I will read the article:

ARTICLE 1. Differences which may arise of a legal nature or relating to the interpretation of treaties existing between the two contracting parties and which it may not have been possible to settle by diplomacy, shall be referred to the Permanent Court of Arbitration established at The Hague by the convention of the 29th of July, 1899, provided, nevertheless, that they do not affect the vital interests, the independence, or the honor of the two contracting States, and do not concern the interests of third parties.

Then article 2:

ART. 2. In each individual case the high contracting parties, before appealing to the Permanent Court of Arbitration, shall conclude a special agreement defining clearly the matter in dispute, the scope of the powers of the arbitrators, and the periods to be fixed for the formation of the arbitral tribunal and the several stages of the procedure. It is understood that on the part of the United States such special agreements will be made by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and on the part of Sweden by the King in such forms and conditions as he may find requisite or appropriate.

ART. 3. The present convention shall be ratified by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof; and by His Majesty the King of Sweden. The ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington as soon as possible, and the convention shall take effect on the date of the exchange of its ratifications.

ART. 4. The present convention is concluded for a period of five years, dating from the day of the exchange of its ratifications. Done in duplicate at the city of Washington, in the English and French languages, this 2d day of May, 1908.

ELIHU ROOT.
W. A. F. EKENGREN.

The same treaty was made with Great Britain and with France, and, as I said, with 25 nations.

Mr. President, we have had all over this country the agitation for the ratification of these treaties and an insistence upon it. There has been a great going up and down the land of orators, some of them paid for the purpose, and others, I have no doubt, going from patriotic motives. They have practically claimed that in case these treaties were not adopted there could be no arbitration of any differences between this Government and any other government, whereas we have now, as I say, these 25 treaties and this Hague convention, the latter signed not only by 25 but by 45 nations of the earth.

Returning to the questions of amendments, my opinion is that the amendment which we ought to adopt is to strike out clause 3. If clause 3 is not stricken out, then we ought to adopt in the ratifying resolution a provision which shall put beyond the shadow of a doubt the fact that clause 3 does not put it within the power of this outside commission to dictate to this Senate when it shall arbitrate a question, but that that high function, imposed upon this Senate by the Constitution of the United States, shall be performed by the Senate under the constitutional oath of each Senator.

I do not think that the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is sufficient, for the reason that the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts simply affirms that which Senators favoring this third clause now say the treaty means, and there will be practically the same uncertainty as to the proper construction of this clause. I desire in case the amendment reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations striking out clause 3 of article 3 is not adopted to offer as an amendment to the resolution of ratification proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, the language which I shall presently read. If the Senate refuses to strike out the third clause, which I very much hope it will not refuse to do, because that is the only proper and consistent thing to do—

Mr. OVERMAN. Is not that recommended by the committee?

Mr. BACON. It is recommended by the Committee on Foreign Relations to strike out the third clause for the reasons which I have endeavored to state. If the third clause is not stricken out, then I desire that we shall adopt a resolution of ratification which shall nullify that clause absolutely and beyond the possibility of construction. Therefore I shall propose what I shall now read as an amendment to the resolution of ratification of the Senator from Massachusetts.

What we ought to do is to strike out the third clause. It is not to the credit, I think, of the Senate of the United States to leave a clause in the treaty and then in the ratification resolution simply correct that error by nullifying it. The plain course is to do as we did in the Hay-Durand treaty. When there came in a proposition that the President of the United States should have the right to make agreements of arbitration without any intervention of the Senate, the Senate simply did not in an amendment nullify that provision in the ratifying clause, but by an amendment it struck out the word "agreement" and put in "treaty," so as to make the body of the treaty express what it ought to say.

The amendment which I shall offer to the resolution of ratification offered by the Senator from Massachusetts is as follows:

Resolved further, That the Senate advises and consents to the ratification of the said treaty, with the understanding, to be made a part of such ratification, that the treaty does not authorize the submission to arbitration of any question which affects the admission of aliens into the United States, or the admission of aliens to the educational institutions of the several States, or the territorial integrity of the several States or of the United States, or concerning the question of the alleged indebtedness or moneyed obligation of any State of the United States, or any question which depends upon or involves the maintenance of the traditional attitude of the United States concerning American questions, commonly described as the Monroe doctrine, or other purely governmental policy.

Mr. President, many Senators, if not all of them, in discussing this question have earnestly pressed the importance of arbitration, have inveighed against war, and have eulogized everything looking to peace as though that were the question here. We are, all of us, in favor of peace; I think I am as much so as any other man here; I believe that every other Senator as well as myself who demands that our constitutional guaranties and our constitutional obligations shall be maintained and performed is in favor of peace.

Mr. President, there is no man so much in favor of peace as the man who has had a practical experience of the horrors of war. I recollect some years ago when the question was before the Senate as to the prosecution of the war in the Philippines, that when I was trying to bring about a condition which would insure peace in those islands and which would stop the desolation and the ruin and the death I said this, which I now repeat, that I wished it were possible that all men, especially all men who could exercise any influence upon the question of peace or of war, could see one battle field on the day after the battle. We read about battles and we think only of the heroism, the glory, the strife, and the victory. But, Mr. President, when the battle is over and a man passes across the field and sees the dead and the dying, the human agony and misery! O sir, the horror, the woe, the pity of it! If all men could see one battle field, not while blood is high and the struggle fierce, but after the noise is gone, when the strife is over, when the roar of guns has ceased and the shouts of the hosts have died away, when there is only the sad picture of the men who are dead on the field and the sadder picture of the men who are torn and mangled and bleeding, that would do more than all the arbitrations that could be put upon paper to stop war.

Mr. President, I have looked upon such a scene, and I am in favor of peace; I am opposed to war; I am in favor of arbitration to prevent war, which I abhor; but because I am in favor of that is no reason why I should stand here and be willing that the institutions of this country shall be imperiled or that the fundamental law of this land shall be violated.

In so far as I have any power to decide as a lawyer, in my judgment to accept these treaties with this third clause in them would be a violation of our constitutional obligations as Senators. Of course, I recognize that a Senator who thinks otherwise does not violate his obligation; but to my mind it is a violation of the Constitution; it is destructive of the great scheme that the States devised when in the formation of the Union each State gave up the power which it then had to make treaties with foreign nations and to control all of its relations with other governments. When they gave up that great power they were not willing that the power should be exercised by the Congress of the United States, because by reason of unequal power in the House of Representatives, some States would in such case have greater power and influence in the making of treaties than would other States; they were not willing that it should be exercised by the President alone, but required the advice and consent of the Senate, where the States are equal in representation; they were not willing, even when the power was committed to the Senate, that a majority of the Senate should determine what treaty should be entered into which would affect the interests of any one of these States, but they said that even if a majority of Senators be in favor of it, before you can make a treaty which shall affect the State of New York, or the State of Massachusetts, or the State of Georgia, before you can make a treaty which will affect either one of the States, not simply a majority of the Senate, not simply a majority of the representatives of the States in the Senate, but two-thirds of the Senate must concur in agreeing to such a treaty. Mr. President, it is a travesty—worse than a travesty—to talk about such a great scheme being set aside and that great power taken away from the Senate and committed to an outside commission, which shall in some cases be composed of citizens of the United States in part, but which in other cases may be composed of parties who are entirely foreign to our land and inimical to our institutions.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I am more anxious that a vote shall be taken, if possible, to-night than I am to discuss further the treaties now pending. At various times during the debate I have felt a strong inclination to relieve my mind somewhat regarding their wisdom and effectiveness of purpose. I reecho the statement of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and of other Senators who have spoken, when I say I am as much in favor of peace as any other Senator or any other citizen of the Republic; but I am forced to believe, after a careful examination of these treaties, that there is more trouble for our country, more vexation, more annoyance, and more misunderstanding in them than there is good to come out of them.

The State Department's foreign policy has been a matter of evolution. When Mr. Cleveland was President Mr. Olney submitted to the Senate a treaty with Lord Pauncefoot for England that described the differences that were to be settled by arbitration, but they carefully reserved all territorial questions from the operation of that treaty, and even when that treaty came before the Senate, so masterful a mind, so conscientious a statesman, and so trained and thorough a diplomat as the then distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Hoar, thought the reservations were not sufficient to protect the United States from European influence, and, with marvelous sagacity, suggested that the treaty ought to be amended, and he offered an amendment:

That no difference shall be submitted under this treaty which in the judgment of either power materially affects its honor, the integrity of its territory, or its foreign or domestic policy.

What happened to that amendment to a general treaty of arbitration brought here through the instrumentality of Mr. Olney and the ambassador from Great Britain? It received 54 votes in this Chamber, and only 13 were recorded against it. Many of the ablest men then in the Senate voted for that limitation. That was the sense of this body, the wise and deliberate judgment of the Senate.

Later, when the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. ROOR], as Secretary of State, entered into an agreement for this Government with Great Britain having for its purpose a similar achievement to the one sought to be attained by Mr. Olney, he was guided by the wise admonition of this body and took out of the questions that might be submitted to arbitration questions of "vital interests, the independence, or the honor of the two contracting States," and the interests of third parties.

That was a carefully drawn treaty, but the treaty we are now considering goes far beyond anything ever attempted in this Chamber before. It might well be denominated as the dragnet achievement of modern diplomacy. It looks like a studied effort to eliminate the Senate altogether, and in that they have been singularly in harmony with the suggestion made by a distinguished English diplomat, who had something to do with the perfection and formation of the treaty we are now considering, who seems to regard the Senate as meddling, although we are the only voice the States have in foreign affairs.

There will not be a controversy in the future that concerns the welfare of the State I represent in this body, especially its relations to Canada, that may not be determined by this joint high commission without my advice or consent—not one. The waterway treaty, about which we had something of a struggle in this Chamber a few years ago, and which was finally amended, through my insistence, to the satisfaction of my State, may again be overhauled by this international joint high commission.

The fisheries treaty with Canada, which some of us delayed and defeated because of its unfairness to our States, may again be the subject of inquiry by this international joint high tribunal; in fact, I am not altogether sure but that the diversion of water from Lake Michigan to the Chicago Drainage Canal may not be the subject of inquiry by this joint high commission, over which we shall have no control. Canada is exercised considerably over that proposition at this moment, and England has very cautiously and wisely reserved to Canada something of a veto on the questions that will be submitted to arbitration under this treaty affecting her welfare, while the representatives of the States and our rights as Senators are to be turned over to strangers, unfamiliar with our institutions and without knowledge of our geographical relationship to the English possessions in this hemisphere.

Mr. President, we have no European possessions calling for our solicitude; we are not going across the sea to assert or maintain our rights; our rights are here on this continent, in this hemisphere; but England has rights here. She has an empire here larger than our own. Is it possible that as the years go by and she attains greater strength, the controversies, territorial and political in character, which will arise between us shall always be the subject of international inquisition before a tribunal constituted of strangers? I hope not. Such an alien supervision would breed distrust and nourish rancor.

I make the bold statement that if we ratify these treaties in the form in which they came to the Senate, there is not a single Senator on this floor who can tell what he has agreed to arbitrate with Great Britain or France—not one. Questions of immigration are left open; the Monroe doctrine is left open, so far as any word from England has been spoken; and it vitally concerns possessions of Great Britain in this hemisphere, for her right to protect herself here is an inherent and natural right of her sovereignty, and the Monroe doctrine will not always serve her purpose. There is not a single question of vital interest to us or of national honor that may not be passed upon by this tribunal on the petition of King George alone. Will Great Britain ever set up a claim against the United States which this country could not under any circumstances entertain, and then demand under this treaty that we leave the issue to third parties? I should like some advocate of these treaties to answer. Is England ever going to ask the Government of the United States to arbitrate a question in the future which the Senate would be unwilling to arbitrate? If not, what is the necessity of this treaty? And if so, should we tie our hands in advance and abandon our functions; no longer retaining either the initiative or the relationship to the treaty-making power which the Constitution imposes upon us?

Mr. President, the hour is late, and I know that Senators are tired and weary, but I want to call their attention to the fact that the treaty we are now considering establishes the means whereby all controversies shall be settled by arbitration; and "all controversies" include every disagreement between the two countries. The means have been determined, we have given our consent, and we are powerless to withdraw. If we withdraw from any agreement or refuse to give it effect, we violate the treaty, because by its terms we have pledged ourselves to every detail therein prescribed. It is not so with The Hague convention. The Hague convention limited the powers of the commission and defined its limitations. A commission appointed to make inquiry under The Hague convention did not even have the power to change its place of sitting; while this treaty, if it is ratified, gives to this mixed tribunal, the joint high commission, the power not only to move the Senate and the Executive, but the entire Government of the United States, on the mere petition of a King of England, a power that never could be exercised by that monarchy through the influences of her bayonets or her battleships.

I have never seen a more reckless attempt to disregard the constitutional power of the Senate than is proposed in this treaty, and there is a purpose in it. We have annoyed English diplomats before and will probably do it again if occasion arises. There is a plain purpose to subvert the powers of the Senate where the States only are represented to the madness of anglomania. In the near future there will be 50,000,000 people in Canada. We are her neighbors; the State of Michigan lies right along the Canadian border; the controversies of England in this hemisphere will be over the rights of that Dominion. Is it possible that the State I represent and the States represented by other Senators on the border will be in better position to obtain exact justice when we pass the settlement of our controversies over to strangers who know nothing about our relations to one another?

The fisheries treaty made by David Starr Jordan, of California, is not a good example of his solicitude, I hope. He allowed Canada to exempt from the operation of the treaty the Georgian Bay, an arm of Lake Huron, while he put under the operation of the international convention Saginaw Bay, another arm of Lake Huron, greatly to the detriment of the fishermen of my State. If we had not made the fight in this Chamber, our fishermen would have fallen unjustly under the jurisdiction of aliens, while their rivals in the Georgian Bay were continued under the immediate control of their brothers in Canada.

Several Senators have said that we will have a voice in the selection of commissioners. We were not accorded this honor when this treaty came from the State Department. There was no suggestion in it that the Senate should even have the right of confirmation, as I recollect.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I will make a suggestion there. Even in case we incorporate into this treaty, either by amendment or by reciting in the clause of ratification a provision for the confirmation by the Senate of the Americans who would be on that commission, that would not reach the case where the commission is organized in some other way, as this treaty says it may be, even to the extent of having foreigners, who could not be confirmed by the Senate, appointed on it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator is entirely right. We would have nothing to say about the commission. If the executives of both countries desired to agree upon the King of Belgium to make a finding, they could do so. We have no power over it at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is not probable that that ever would be done.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is entirely within the range of the possibilities. Great American questions have often been submitted by agreement to European sovereigns; not by wholesale, however, as this treaty provides, but only by specific agreement.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. Reference to a single arbitrator is one of the commonest forms of settling controversies. The question in connection with the Strait of Juan de Fuca, up in the Northwest, was referred to the Emperor of Germany under the Alabama treaty, and the award was in our favor. The question of the slaves carried off after the War of 1812 was referred to the Emperor of Russia, and the award was in our favor. The question of the northwestern boundary was referred to the King of the Netherlands, and we held that he had simply expressed an opinion but had not decided the case, and his report was protested. I mention these three cases that happen to occur to my mind to show that nothing is commoner than to agree on the head of some other nation—a president or a king, as the case may be—and refer such questions to him as a disinterested umpire.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Now, let me ask the Senator—

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me for a minute. The very latest arbitration we have had was with Chile, which—

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; which was referred to the King of England, and he decided it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Now, let me ask the Senator from Massachusetts, before he takes his seat, if it is not entirely possible under this treaty for the executives of two countries to constitute a sovereign of a foreign State as a joint high commissioner?

Mr. LODGE. The language is as broad as possible. The high commission of inquiry may be made up in any way that the Governments of the two countries please.

Mr. ROOT. May I ask a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. ROOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan his idea as to the duty of the Senate in case the joint high commission is made up of one foreign sovereign and all but one of the commission decide that the question is arbitrable.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senate has already bound itself; it has agreed on the method for selecting the joint commission. We have nothing more to say about the means. The means by which arbitration is attained are specified in the engagement. We have agreed upon them and have put that question away from us, and we have no right to say how the commission shall be constituted.

Mr. BACON. I suggest to the Senator from New York that if there is a single commissioner and he should find a certain way it would be a unanimous decision.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is the language of the treaty.

Mr. ROOT. Is it not clear that the provisions regarding the determination by all, or all but one, of the members of the commission are applicable only to the case of a commission made up in the normal way, which is described in article 2 of the treaty, and that the last clause of article 3, therefore, is applicable only to a commission made up in that way?

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator read the clause about the creation of the commission—the original clause which authorizes it?

Mr. ROOT. The original clause.

Mr. BACON. It will be found at the top of the page.

Mr. ROOT. It reads:

The high contracting parties further agree to institute as occasion arises and as hereinafter provided a joint high commission of inquiry.

That is article 2. The second paragraph of article 2 is as follows:

Whenever a question or matter of difference is referred to the joint high commission of inquiry, as herein provided, each of the high contracting parties shall designate three of its nationals to act as members of the commission of inquiry for the purposes of such reference; or the commission may be otherwise constituted in any particular case by the terms of reference.

Mr. LODGE. That is absolutely unlimited.

Mr. ROOT. My view is that the final clause of article 3 applies only to a commission made up in the way described in article 2, and that no conclusion by any commission otherwise constituted under the concluding clause of article 3 would have any binding force or effect whatever.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. To illustrate the clearness of the situation confronting us in this matter it is only necessary to say that the distinguished Senator from New York, whose judgment and opinion everybody values, and the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, whose judgment and opinion are equally valuable, disagree about it. Now, if these great Senators disagree about it, is it not likely that countries which are already out of accord may also fail to take the American view of the manner of appointing commissioners?

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think any disagreement is possible about the first provision, that the commission may be made up in any way that the high contracting parties deem best. I think the intention of the third clause of article 3 is as pointed out by the Senator from New York, but I do not see that it binds the high contracting parties in the least.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. To say the least, we have provided the means for settling these disputes. Now, having provided the means, we have nothing further to say about it. We have abdicated; we have given up our power.

As a part of the means of settling the difference we have agreed that the question shall be submitted to the joint high commission, and the word "means" is emphasized in this treaty both in the preamble and in the message of the President twice. So we would have nothing whatever to say about the composition of this commission.

It is said that we will still have the power to confirm the American commission, and if they are not of our way of thinking they will not be confirmed. This would not be good faith, and in honor we should scorn such an unfair advantage if peace and respect for one another are to be maintained. The way to avoid misunderstandings is to cut this third clause out of the treaty now, because it will be the most fruitful source of disagreement in the future.

There is no question at all about what it means. It is an invitation to Great Britain to hunt up every controversy that has been denied a standing at our State Department and press it now, when a hearing can not be denied, and before a mixed tribunal.

The favored-nation clause of our treaties of commerce and amity may be made the subject of international inquiry under this arrangement. We gave a preferential to Cuba on her sugar, and since we did it under the ban of the Brussels convention I do not believe there has been a ton of sugar shipped into any country that is a party to the Brussels convention. If that concession is harmful to England or France either may invoke a joint high commission under this treaty to inquire into it. Is there any Senator on this floor who can deny that?

Article 1 says "all differences." As I said a little while ago to the Senator from Georgia, if England, through her Bahama Islands, is unfavorably affected because of a condition of affairs existing in Cuba, she may invoke instantly, under this treaty, a joint high commission to sit upon the case, and we are not to be consulted about it. We have already agreed to it as a means of peace. She may invoke a joint high commission instantly to inquire into the Government of Cuba and its relations to the Caribbean Sea. Her inquiry into the Government of Cuba may lead her to believe that our policy there affects her own possessions unfairly, and a controversy that is now beyond her reach may become acute in this hemisphere as a result of our action to-day.

Although we have spent hundreds of millions of dollars to give Cuba her freedom, and our soldiers have fought her battles, and our country has guaranteed her independence, yet if this is to be the means of settling all future differences between England and France and the United States, our claims may well become the subject of international inquiry by the initiative of either power.

We have agreed that as a means of protecting the two countries from misunderstandings this method of arbitration shall be engaged in. I do not think there is a controversy affecting any State or on the border with Canada, or a controversy affecting the United States and Canada, or the question of our proposed levy of tolls on the Isthmian Canal, or any question of immigration that affects England or any of her possessions in this hemisphere that is beyond the reach of this joint high commission, which is to be superimposed upon our Government by our consent, to determine for the Senate and for the country what questions are to be arbitrable and what questions are not.

There never has been such an engagement between the United States of America and any other power in our history, and there ought not to be one now. It will not lead to peace. It will lead to misunderstanding and reprisals and possibly war. The treaty does not say specifically what shall be submitted, but says "all differences" shall be submitted. That is a dragnet of tremendous proportions, and extends from pole to pole and ocean to ocean, and will involve our diplomacy in difficulty from the start.

So, Mr. President, I can not see any good reason why we should create this new intermediate court to decide for the Senate and the Executive what is arbitrable and what is not arbitrable between England and the United States. When England's Monarch signed the treaty he consulted his own sweet will, and with a glittering coronet upon his brow exercised his sovereign authority. But under our form of Government the President of the United States must consult the Senate, and the controversy is here.

Are we going to abdicate and give up our power to determine what is arbitrable or justiciable between England and our own country or are we going to maintain our historic authority to pass upon each question of difference as it arises intelligently and patriotically? So far as I am concerned, I will never vote to give up the power conferred upon us by the States of the Union. It is the only voice the States have directly in such matters. Any Senator who can smear his conscience with a peace motive for thus giving away a solemn constitutional right has my profound sympathy.

Mr. President, I had intended to go more thoroughly into our foreign policy. I had intended to take up the history of the treaties, now the supreme law of the land, and show the care with which they were entered into. The conduct of the Senate has been most praiseworthy in every one, amending here and there and construing by resolution as they thought wise. They have shown a solicitude for the magnitude of the interests involved that, I fear, is not fully appreciated by the country. But the very illuminating speech of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] left every other member of the committee with less responsibility than he otherwise would have felt, while the thorough and candid and able discussion by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] to-day has made my duty a very easy one.

I am unwilling to fetter the Senate or the Executive by conferring any such power as we are asked to bestow upon this new tribunal; and I would consider myself unworthy to stand in this place or to hold a commission from my State if I consented to the enactment of such a law as this. Every question that should be arbitrated can be arbitrated under the Root-Bryce treaty and under The Hague convention now. Why we should circumscribe further the constitutional power of the Senate I am at a loss to understand.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to ask the Senator a question, and it is purely for information. I have not been in the Senate for the last three days, and therefore have not had the opportunity of hearing the discussion of the Senator from Massachusetts, and I have heard only a part of the discussion of the Senator from Georgia.

I agree entirely with the interpretation which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], and before him the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], put upon the third paragraph of article 3. With respect to its constitutionality I express no opinion at this moment. But what I want to learn from the Senator from Michigan, who is the first member of the committee I have had an opportunity to inquire of, is this: The Senator from Michigan thinks it is very unwise that the Senate shall surrender the right to say whether a given controversy or difference is or is not justiciable. I understand both the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Georgia to believe that it is not only unwise, but unconstitutional as well.

In the first article of the treaty we agree in advance and before the controversies have arisen to submit to arbitration every difference of a justiciable character. Now, I want to ask the Senator from Michigan this question: Suppose that in the time to come a controversy should arise between the United States and Great Britain that was plainly justiciable; the Senator from Michigan would say to his conscience it was justiciable, and that it was not included in any of the exceptions that are intended to be engrafted upon the treaty. Would the Senator from Michigan feel at liberty to decline to submit the controversy to arbitration if he believed, at that time and under all the circumstances surrounding, that the difference was one which ought not to be arbitrated?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If I thought that the question ought not to be arbitrated I would dismiss the question of its justiciability without a moment's consideration.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then, if that be true, if I correctly apprehend the answer of the Senator from Michigan—and I thought I understood his position through the whole course of his argument—his argument is against any treaty which agrees to submit to arbitration controversies that have yet to arise.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; controversies that are of vital interest or concern our national honor or our own welfare.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. But I have said—and the Senator from Michigan must bear that in mind—that the assumed controversy that I have before me is one that is justiciable; and there are many that are justiciable and which do not concern our own honor or our integrity or our independence. Now, suppose that such a controversy were to arise. The Senator from Michigan, when he votes for this treaty with the third paragraph of the third article stricken out, has agreed that the Government will submit such a difference of opinion or controversy to arbitration, and the Senator would not in honor be allowed to determine for himself at that time whether or not the controversy was one which should be arbitrated; I mean under the circumstances surrounding us at that time.

The Senate will have agreed, if it ratifies this treaty, that it will submit to arbitration every justiciable controversy, if it be not included within these exceptions. Now, if that be true, has not the Senate surrendered, in making the treaty itself—I care not in what form it is phrased—its right to determine at the time and under the circumstances which then prevail whether arbitration should take place or not; and if it is unconstitutional and impolitic to surrender this power under the third paragraph of the third article, is it not equally unconstitutional and impolitic to surrender the latter power which I have mentioned, and which, of course, leads inevitably to the conclusion that we ought not to enter into any treaty agreeing to arbitrate questions that have not yet arisen?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I want to give the Senator from Iowa an illustration of what I meant by my answer. Under the Webster-Ashburton treaty the boundary line between Canada and the United States has been fixed and acquiesced in for over 70 years. Under this treaty our denial of a claim for a division of water or of territory might be a justiciable claim. Now, have I done my duty to my State by passing that controversy up to an international tribunal to determine whether or not the subject of the claim should be arbitrated or not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. With pleasure.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator from Michigan contend that the only limitation in this treaty is justiciableness? Is there not also in the same clause a further limitation that it must be a question hereafter arising and that it must be an international one? Does not the Senator think he is using as an illustration a question that has been settled too long—

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No.

Mr. WILLIAMS. To hereafter give rise to differences?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is a live question to-day. The boundary between Canada and the United States is to-day being re-marked under the direction of Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The question is as live to-day as it ever was.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And so long as that treaty lasts, whether it has lasted for 50 years or is to last for 50 years more, every controversy growing out of it would be the subject of international arbitration under this agreement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Any controversy growing out of it that did not involve matters decided by the treaty itself.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, matters of detail, as to where the surveyor's line is to run may arise—

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Mississippi is mistaken. This treaty does not confine us to differences that may hereafter arise out of treaties to be hereafter made.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no; but to questions that may hereafter arise.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But which may grow out of treaties now existing, and it gives an invitation to Great Britain to revive questions which may be passed upon by this international tribunal that have been dead for 50 years.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think it does.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator has just said on questions that would hereafter arise. If the question would hereafter arise, then that is an answer to the proposition that it has been dead for 50 years.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator knows better than that. The Senator knows that the construction of the treaty now existing between Great Britain and the United States may be reviewed to-morrow after we pass this treaty, and if it is reviewed to-morrow and one party to the treaty finds that they are out of accord with the other upon any question involved, it may be taken before the joint high commission which we have created as a means of avoiding disputes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that; provided it be a question newly arising under the treaty.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is what I said.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. CUMMINS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield, and to whom?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts, who has been on his feet for several minutes.

Mr. LODGE. I rose only in connection with what the Senator from Mississippi said. A question may arise under an old treaty that has been acquiesced in for half a century.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is no dispute on that point.

Mr. LODGE. A question might arise under the Webster-Ashburton treaty or under the treaty of 1844, which settled the northwestern boundary, or under any treaty, no matter how long it existed. Only a short time ago we went into arbitration with Great Britain on the Alaskan boundary question under a treaty of 1824, which had been acquiesced in for more than half a century. The claims were comparatively modern on the Canadian side. We had to take it to London and settle it, and it was settled by a tribunal there. The fact that a treaty is an old treaty and has been long acquiesced in does not prevent questions being raised if people want to raise them, as Canada raised a question on the Alaskan boundary.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope neither the Senator from Massachusetts nor the Senator from Michigan thought me stupid enough when I said questions hereafter to arise to think that I meant new questions could not possibly arise.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; but an old question may arise again and be a subject of controversy.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If that particular old question has arisen and has been settled, then my contention is that it can not arise under this treaty. That is the contention exactly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Mississippi would not contend that apparent acquiescence upon the part of either party to a controverted question that had arisen years ago under a treaty would bar either party from a hearing before this tribunal.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Apparent acquiescence, no; but real—

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There is no court of final resort.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that. Back of all this treaty and of any possible treaty lies the startling fact that there is no international court of final resort and that each nation is its own court of appeals. That is the unfortunate part of the situation. But that has nothing to do with the discussion of the question of the justice and ethics of it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; but the Senator from Mississippi must admit that there is no final adjudication of such controversy in international law; either party to the engagement may revive it at will, and our course to-day accentuates this right.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator mean by that that any nation has that power? That is true.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is all I contend for.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Any nation has the power to agree expressly to one thing this year and the next year to violate its express agreement. I am not talking about power.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not think, then, there is any misunderstanding, because what I said in the first place was that this was a drag-net proposition, and nothing escapes it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I call the Senator from Michigan to the point from which he departed a few moments ago.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I did not quite finish my illustration with the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will take the blame.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Michigan was illustrating a case which he thought would answer the inquiry I put to him, but I wanted long ago to call his attention to the fact that the joint high commission could by no possibility have anything to do with the case which has been so thoroughly exploited in the last few moments.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. You mean the territorial question?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly not; because if we have a treaty with Great Britain fixing the boundaries that lie between her territory and ours and all that remains to do is to put upon the ground the monuments which shall mark the boundary, undoubtedly that is a justiciable question. There could be no question about it in anybody's mind. I mean under this treaty as now drawn, without amendment. Therefore there could be no award of the joint high commission respecting the justiciableness of that difference of opinion. You could submit that difference to arbitration, as such differences have been submitted. But such controversies would not be submitted to the joint high commission in order to determine whether they were of a character that ought to be arbitrated or not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In the illustration I gave I had in mind the fact that Canada has never wholly acquiesced in the territorial boundaries between that Dominion and the State of Michigan, and they are unmarked.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do.

Mr. ROOT. May I ask the Senator from Michigan if he has any doubt that the very question which he is putting by way of illustration would have to be arbitrated now under the existing treaty of arbitration?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Have you any doubt about it?

Mr. ROOT. I have none.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Now, let me answer that. There is no doubt whatever that if we carried out in good faith our present engagements and England asked for arbitration upon that question, we would have to consider it and possibly submit it, but we would decide in this Chamber whether to submit it or not. However, if this treaty passes, this Chamber has absolved itself from deciding such a question, and the question will be decided by a joint high commission constituted of three nationals from each country or otherwise, as they may see fit.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield further to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. We are getting near the vital issue, as it seems to me. The Senator from Michigan has just said that if it were proposed to arbitrate that question we would be at liberty to vote for its arbitration or to vote against its arbitration.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I said "we," referring to the Government, which would probably arbitrate it; but, acting for myself and in my capacity as a Senator, I would be privileged to hold that the present boundary was sufficient.

Mr. CUMMINS. This treaty compels the Senator from Michigan in honor to submit such a question to arbitration. The treaties that we already have, as suggested by the Senator from New York, would compel the Senator from Michigan in honor to submit the controversy to arbitration.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not think I am driven quite that far.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then you are not driven that far?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Did the Senator from New York refer to The Hague convention?

Mr. ROOT. I was referring to the existing treaty between the United States and Great Britain.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is, the treaty of 1908.

Mr. ROOT. Yes; which we have ratified in accordance with the advice and consent of the Senate, in which the United States solemnly agrees that every such question shall be submitted to arbitration.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But the form—

Mr. ROOT. It imposes upon the Senate the obligation in good faith and honor to confirm in some form the special agreement for submission to arbitration.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think the treaty of 1908 goes a good way toward the settlement of any differences between these two countries, and I publicly commend the skill of the Senator from New York in bringing to us a treaty so wholesome and valuable to the Government. But it is a vastly different thing to say that arbitration has been provided for by this treaty and asking us to conform to the judgment of an international tribunal composed entirely of strangers, possibly. It is a vastly different thing.

Mr. ROOT. That is another story.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; it is another story. It is the next step and the only alternative if we ratify this treaty; and not only the Senate, but the President of the United States, will have no power whatever to refuse to submit to arbitration any proposition which this joint high commission which we are to superimpose upon ourselves may determine to be arbitrable.

Mr. ROOT. May I call the Senator's attention to the fact—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield further to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. ROOT. I am dealing with this illustration: The Senator is finding fault with the pending treaty because it would compel the arbitration of a question relating to the boundary laid down under the Webster-Ashburton treaty of 1842. I am calling attention to the fact that his criticism upon the pending treaty is not a just one, because every such question would have to be arbitrated now under the existing treaty, and the pending treaty would not in any way whatever increase the necessity or the obligation of arbitrating just such a question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from New York that the treaty of 1908 does not move the President of the United States against his will and does not move the Senate of the United States against its will, but this joint high commission moves both of them against their will when once fully committed to its terms.

Mr. ROOT. The treaty of 1908 moves the President of the United States and the Senate of the United States, whatever be their wills, if there be faith and honor in the President and the Senate of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, no. We may both move leisurely or even not at all, as is frequently done; the arbitral question has not yet been finally determined by both parties, possibly.

Mr. ROOT. Because we have solemnly bound ourselves to submit to arbitration in the treaty of 1908 the very question that the Senator from Michigan has described in his illustration.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from New York is usually right, but he knows that there is still a function for the Senate to perform, and that if my voice here has any potency at all, and that controversy comes, I have my day in court and my State may be heard. But pass this treaty with the third clause of article 3 in it and we are rendered impotent and powerless, and the voice of every other Senator, even the hand and the voice of the President of the United States, is powerless to prevent arbitration, because he has elected to eliminate himself and the Senate from that controversy which determines the justiciable character of an issue that is sought to be settled by England. We have a constitutional office to perform here. The Senate in the past has seen fit to delay and to amend important treaties, as was its duty. But now, for the first time in our history, we seek to fetter in advance the hands of the Executive, who hereafter will be compelled to move at the instance of a foreign power in the direction of final arbitration, and you will manacle Senators of the United States, denying them the right to approach the subject of arbitration in the constitutional way.

Good faith, the Senator from New York suggests. Yet I have heard many Senators in this body say that if a controversy arises between the United States and England which we do not consider it our duty to submit to arbitration we still have the power of appointing commissioners to nullify what? Honor? And our plighted faith? He who relies upon a fixed commission to save us from disaster has not a very high standard of public morality or national honor. It is like submitting a case to a jury—if you can get your friends on it and know in advance what their verdict is to be. National honor would admonish us to pause at the threshold of this undertaking before we engage to do something that may be very detrimental to our country and the States we represent. Exalt national honor, but do not fix a commission afterwards to meet an exigency. National honor, yes; but do not use the high office of President, who has intentionally and completely absolved himself from responsibility, to further nullification in order that we may escape the penalty of our folly. I am not sure that the attempt to minimize our power is not an impertinence.

Mr. BAILEY. Who has done that?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The distinguished Senator from Texas, whom I greatly admire, a few moments ago took himself out of the field of diplomacy by saying what all of us knew was not exactly true, that he did not know anything about it. He is not quite ignorant on this point.

Mr. BAILEY. I was talking about international law; but I know a little about individual morals, and if anybody has been proposing to pack the court I want to vote against them.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if the Senator from Texas had been present in the Chamber during the debates upon these treaties he would have heard said more than once that we were not subscribing to anything in blank, because the power to name commissioners still rested in the Executive, who had parted with the power to withhold the arbitration.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Michigan permit me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. I would not vote for this treaty at all. I do not need to profess to be a man of peace. I am a little inclined to think bloodletting sometimes is good for nations. I think nations will quit going to war when individuals quit resenting insults. But still I should like to reduce war to a minimum, and I desire to vote for any reasonable measure that will do that.

However, I would not vote for this, which pledges us in advance to submit justiciable questions to arbitration, without reserving to myself the right to decide at last what was justiciable. I would decide that according to my best judgment. If I had bound myself in advance, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] very pertinently suggested, to submit a justiciable question, and I was brought face to face with it, however indisposed I might be to submit it, I would still keep my pledge and submit it. All I want to do is to reserve to the Senate the right to say whether or not the question falls within the rule which we have adopted.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like the attention of the Senator from Texas a moment. The unblushing truth is that if this treaty is passed you have agreed in advance as to who shall determine the justiciable character of the controversy.

Mr. BAILEY. As I understand it, that is true without the motion of the Senator from Georgia and without the resolution of ratification as proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts. Now, without one or the other of those I should unquestionably vote against it, although I do not profess to know much about it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The resolution of ratification of the Senator from Massachusetts does not give us the right to determine the justiciable character of the controversy.

Mr. BAILEY. That is what it was intended to do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I know it was; but the Senator from Massachusetts in his speech the other day, which still rings in this Chamber because of its patriotism and its vigor and its illuminating character, said that the best way to do it to avoid any controversy was to strike clause 3 of article 3 out.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; but then he said, as I understood him, if that was not done the resolution of ratification left the matter open to no doubt.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If that is not done.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me—

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I said then what I have thought from the beginning, that the simplest thing to do is to strike out clause 3, but that might cause very grave difficulties and imperil the final success of the treaties, and that I certainly should not, by my personal preference as to the method of arbitration, stand in the way if I could attain the same result by the resolution. My belief is that my resolution retains the power of the Senate wholly unimpaired, and that if any treaty is sent to us from an international high commission of inquiry, assuming the adoption of my resolution, we have an absolute right to reject that treaty on any ground that we think proper without the violation in the slightest degree of honor or good faith or moral obligation.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, we would have the same right without the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. BAILEY. No; we would have the power, but not the right.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We would not have a contemporaneous construction of the engagement we have entered into, but the constitutional power would remain without asserting it, if we have it at all.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator from Michigan will permit the interruption, I read the speech delivered by the Secretary of State in the city of Cincinnati. It seemed to take this view, which satisfied my mind, and I brought it into the Senate Chamber and asked to have it printed as a public document, so as to make it a part of the printed history of this transaction. While, I repeat, I do not know much about these things, I understand such plain statements as that, and I thought it deserved to be recorded as the judgment of the Secretary of State, who negotiated the treaty.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But what is the opinion of the other party to the treaty? The agreement has been made.

Mr. BAILEY. I could say some things about that, but not being a diplomat I do not know whether it is wise to say them or not, and I shall forbear.

Mr. LODGE. But the Senate resolution which I offered of ratification, if adopted, becomes a part of the treaty. That has been decided absolutely, of course, as every one knows, in the Supreme Court in the case of Doe v. Braden, in 16 Howard. It becomes a part of the treaty, and if accepted by the other side it is just as binding as any other portion of the treaty.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The substance of the Senator's resolution—

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; but the Senator from Michigan is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from Massachusetts intend by his resolution that when the special agreement comes before the Senate in any given case a Senator may in honor vote precisely as though no arbitration treaty had been entered into?

Mr. LODGE. Not at all; but he may vote precisely as he would vote if no submission to the high commission of inquiry had been agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is to say, if he believes it to be a justiciable question, then he must vote for arbitration. If he believes it not to be a justiciable question, then he is at liberty to vote against arbitration, even though the joint high commission has found it to be a justiciable matter.

Mr. LODGE. I think we reserve to the Senate the right to decide and to the President the right to decide, after the action of the commission, whether in their opinion the question is justiciable under the first article. That is all I care for. If we reserve that power, we are absolutely safe, in my judgment.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask another question of the Senator from Massachusetts? He has described or expressed that liberty of action on the part of the Senate in the following way: That a special agreement in each case shall be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, means the concurrence of the Senate in the full exercise of its constitutional power.

Now, what are the constitutional powers?

Mr. LODGE. Its constitutional power is to advise and consent, to amend or reject, on any ground it pleases, or on no ground.

Mr. CUMMINS. My only suggestion is, and I believe it to be a sound one, that this language obliterates article 1 of the treaty as effectually as it does paragraph 3 of article 3.

Mr. LODGE. I think not. I think it leaves to the Senate the power to decide and pass upon the justiciability of any question; that is, whether it comes within article 1 or not.

If those provisions about the high commission of inquiry were not in the treaty at all, if those were simply left out, and we had followed the example of the treaties made by the Senator from New York [Mr. Roor] when Secretary of State, and then a treaty had been submitted by the President, we would have had the right to say whether we would ratify it or not, but there has been interjected this high commission of inquiry. My resolution does not aim at the first article of the treaty; it aims at the high commission of inquiry.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It aims to kill it just as much as if you struck it out, does it not?

Mr. LODGE. It aims to prevent our making promises that we will not carry out.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask the Senator a question? Why should there be a joint high commission of inquiry upon that point if its finding is to have no effect?

Mr. LODGE. You might as well ask why it is in The Hague convention. The joint high commission of inquiry is in The Hague convention.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan is entitled to the floor. Does he yield further?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is given no such power as this in The Hague convention.

Mr. LODGE. No; that is a new feature. The Hague convention thought, and thought wisely, that the high commission of inquiry would be of great value, and they provided specifically it should have no power to make an award. Yet they thought it would be valuable, and I think so, too. It would give the cooling-off time the Senator spoke of yesterday. It would give a year before it could meet. It would then have an opportunity to investigate and report. I object, and I object alone, to the third clause of article 3, which binds us to do what in certain cases we would not do. I will never in the Senate make any promise to another nation in a treaty which I am not prepared to carry out to the letter. The obligation is a moral obligation, and we should agree to nothing that we will not carry out absolutely to the letter.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. May I ask a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. One more question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield, and to whom?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am appealing for information.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Iowa was interrogating the Senator from Massachusetts. I am perfectly willing he shall do it in my time. It is very interesting.

Mr. CUMMINS. One more question, and then I will wait until some other time. If what the Senator from Massachusetts has just stated is sound—and it seems to me eminently sound—why should we not make the paragraph mean precisely what we intend it to mean, or else strike it out entirely? Why should we attempt to interpret it in the vague way found in the proposed resolution of ratification?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to hear the Senator from Massachusetts answer that, as the question is directed to him.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the clause is stricken out, in my opinion it imperils the treaties; I think they may fail entirely. I should be very sorry to see them fail entirely. I think if we succeed in carrying out the same purpose without amending the body of the treaties we shall be able to sustain them, and they will be ratified by all parties to them.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. SMITH of Georgia addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan has the floor. To whom does the Senator now yield?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I want to ask a question of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who did not quite catch the warning of the Chair. The Senator from Mississippi addressed an inquiry to the Senator from Massachusetts, and I did not quite catch it myself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Which—question or the warning? [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I caught the warning.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know I did not catch it, and I wanted to ask the Senator from Massachusetts this question: If striking out clause 3 of article 3 might result in the defeat of the treaty, and if, as I rather suspect—and I leave the suspicion to be solved by the Senator from Massachusetts—his amendment does nullify, annihilate, and kill clause 3 of article 3, then why not do it directly rather than indirectly? In other words, does the Senator from Massachusetts believe that the acute intellects in the service of foreign governments as diplomats are so simple and foolish as not to know a direct and an indirect destruction of a clause one from another?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it is to be remembered that the negotiators of the treaty give to that clause the interpretation embodied in my resolution. The treaty has two other stages to pass after its ratification here.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does your resolution kill or not kill clause 3 of article 3?

Mr. LODGE. In my judgment it preserves to the Senate all of its constitutional powers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In your judgment does it not kill clause 3 of article 3?

Mr. LODGE. Well, that question, Mr. President—

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will not push it.

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly willing to answer it.

Mr. RAYNER. I would suggest that it does not kill it; it only wounds it.

Mr. LODGE. What it does is this: It deprives the action of the international commission of any finality or binding force upon the Senate or on the President of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President—

Mr. LODGE. Let me finish.

Mr. President, what I was about to say was, if the treaty is ratified here, it then goes back to the Executive and he can submit it to the power with whom it was made, or he can decline to do so, and it ends there, as did the treaties of 1904. If he sends it to the other power, then it is for that power to ratify it. So that there are two further stages. I am very sure that if we ratify the treaties, with my resolution, they will become the supreme law of the land. I can speak with no assurance as to the effect which would be produced by striking out clause 3 of article 3.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think I detect in the demeanor of the Senator from New Hampshire a disposition to ask for a recess.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Michigan is correct. I think it is time we took one.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. LODGE. Of course I yield to the Senator to do anything he wants to do, but I should like to say—

Mr. GALLINGER. I was about appealing to the Senator from Massachusetts. I have no disposition to take this matter out of the Senator's hands.

Mr. LODGE. I understood that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was going to remark that it is manifest that this discussion, interesting as it is, can not be completed to-day, and I think it is time—we have been here five hours, more or less—that we should take a recess and meet at some convenient time to-morrow to take up the controversy.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan still has the floor. He has simply yielded it temporarily.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I think I will for the first time take a little liberty with the parliamentary proceedings of the Senate and ask for a recess myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. It is immaterial to me, Mr. President, who asks for it. I appeal to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I move that the Senate take a recess until half past 1 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. CURTIS (to Mr. SMITH of Michigan). Make it 12 o'clock.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan moves that the Senate now take a recess until 1.30 o'clock to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. LODGE. I hope the Senator will allow me to make that motion.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I withhold the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts desire to make the motion?

Mr. LODGE. I have been supposed to be in charge of the treaties, and I wanted—

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I certainly do not want to usurp that honor and distinction. I am content to come along just a little behind the Senator from Massachusetts, who ranks me on the committee, and I therefore cheerfully give him the right to make the motion.

Mr. LODGE. No; it is not a question of making the motion; it is as to the question of the time. I do not care who makes the motion if he gets the time right.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What time would the Senator prefer? I wanted to say a word or two about that before the motion was made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan withdraws the motion temporarily.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, under this unanimous-consent agreement—and I am entirely opposed to the form of unanimous-consent agreement which provides for a vote on a certain legislative day—we could go on taking recesses in this way indefinitely, but the effect of it is that we can not even adjourn without violating the unanimous-consent agreement, and we shut out all Senate business of every kind to the great inconvenience of Senators. There are some Senators who are obliged to leave this week; some of them may have to leave to-morrow; some of them who have come here especially to vote upon the treaties are called away by illness, and I do not think that this debate ought to be protracted beyond another day. I think we ought to make some arrangement, if possible, to-day to secure a vote to-morrow. If the Senator from Michigan will change his motion to 11 o'clock to-morrow I shall be very glad to agree to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I think that 12 o'clock—

Mr. LODGE. If we can have an agreement to vote at some definite time to-morrow—

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let us meet at 12 o'clock and vote at 4 o'clock.

Mr. LODGE. If I can have an agreement that the vote shall be taken upon the amendments to the treaty, on the resolutions, and on all amendments pending or to be offered not later than 4 o'clock to-morrow, I shall cheerfully agree to any hour of meeting that the Senate desires.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I desire to make an inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I was just going to suggest that this has been done so many times since I have been a Member of this body that I hesitate to concur in the judgment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I want to make a suggestion, if the Senator from Michigan will yield to me for a minute.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Just one minute. If we are to fix an hour to-morrow, say, 4 o'clock or 5 o'clock, when we shall vote upon the treaties, there will hardly be a quorum here all day until the time to vote. I have been very hopeful that the discussion, apart from anything that I have tried to contribute toward it, might be illuminating and helpful, and I know that to-morrow would be spent very profitably if Senators could attend the sessions until this matter is disposed of.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. My suggestion is that we vote to-night.

Mr. LODGE. Well, I should, of course, very much prefer that.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not think there are many Senators who desire to debate the treaty further, and I think, with a little more patience, we can reach a conclusion to-night, when we certainly have a fairly full Senate. If we renew the debate in the morning it will perhaps run to as late an hour then as we have now arrived at.

Mr. LODGE. It certainly will.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. My own judgment is that the Senate had better remain in session and dispose of the treaty to-night.

Mr. LODGE. I should prefer that course.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from New York [Mr. Root] and several other Senators have indicated an intention to take part in this debate. I have not consumed very much time myself, and would have been through in a very short time to-day had it not been for the interruptions, but I do not believe we can get a vote to-night.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is evident we can not.

Mr. LODGE. I do not see really—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan still has the floor.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. LODGE. I will wait until I get the floor in my own right.

Mr. ROOT. I do not wish to delay the taking of a vote upon the treaties. There are a few things, however, which I think ought to be said before the vote is taken, and which I have not yet heard said. Unless some other Senator says them I want to say them. There are several Senators who, I understand, have their names down on a list as entitled to recognition. I am willing to condense what I have to say within a very narrow compass, but I do not wish the vote taken until I shall have had that opportunity.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, Mr. President—

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LODGE. No; I do not ask that. I will wait until the Senator takes his seat.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I was going to move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan moves that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I will wait until I can get the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan moves that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. LODGE. I move to amend that motion by making it 11 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to amend the motion by making the hour of meeting 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no.

Mr. LODGE. Wait a moment. I wanted to get the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President—

Mr. LODGE. I believe I have the floor, Mr. President, having moved an amendment to the motion.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I believe I will concur in the amendment and accept it. Do I get the floor now. [Laughter.]

Mr. LODGE. I think not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I could not yield the floor to anyone more entitled to it than the Senator from Massachusetts, and I do so cheerfully.

Mr. LODGE. I thank the Senator from Michigan. I only wanted to get an opportunity to say to the Senate that there are a number of Senators who have informed me, some within the last few minutes, that they are obliged to leave here on Friday; and I think it is only justice to Senators who have been waiting here to vote, and some who have come here for that purpose, to make an agreement that the matter shall be disposed of to-morrow.

Mr. BACON. I suggest to the Senator that we agree that a vote be taken to-morrow before adjournment or before a recess.

Mr. LODGE. "Before adjournment"—that is just where we are now.

Mr. BACON. Before a recess.

Mr. LODGE. "Before a recess"—that is no better. You can make it, if you choose, the calendar day of to-morrow, and stay here until midnight; but I see no possible reason for that. I do not see why we should be met with objection to agreeing to take a vote at a certain time, in the hope that we will thereby keep Senators in their seats. If the debate is not of merit enough to keep them in their seats, you can not keep them there by failing to fix a time for a vote.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I am one of those who complained to the Senator from Massachusetts regarding the way in which these proceedings are being conducted. The Senate adjourned yesterday at an early hour and wasted a whole day, no one being ready to proceed. Such procedure certainly is not fair to Members of the Senate who have made engagements, with the reasonable expectation that they would be able to leave town toward the end of the week, and, so far as I am concerned, I will be deprived of the opportunity to vote upon these treaties by reason of the necessity of going away to-morrow. If the proceedings continue to be conducted in this interminable manner, doubtless there will be many on the following day in the same position as I am now. Certainly, those of us who have engagements have some rights and are entitled to have this proceeding expedited and not have the Senate adjourn, as it did yesterday, and waste a whole day because no Senator was ready to speak, and certainly no one was willing to hear anyone, should he be willing to speak.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I think it proper to say to the Senator—

Mr. PENROSE. I was not in the Senate and do not know the circumstances.

Mr. BACON. I was going to say to the Senator that had he been here—

Mr. PENROSE. I was not.

Mr. BACON. He would not make that remark, because we had three very elaborate and illuminating speeches on the question, one by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN], one by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], and one by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. And the Senate adjourned about 4 o'clock, because nobody was ready to go on.

Mr. PENROSE. It would seem to me, under a unanimous-consent agreement of this kind, as if the spirit of it was that the proceedings should be pushed to a conclusion, and what we ought to do to-night is to stay here until we vote on the treaties.

Mr. CUMMINS. I rise to a point of order, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa rises to a point of order, which he will state.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is the motion now before the Senate debatable?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not a debatable question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then I call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded, which precludes further debate. Debate can only be had by unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. If debate is going to be stopped, I hope the Senate will vote the motion down.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is not debatable, and the regular order has been demanded.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Objection to what?

The VICE PRESIDENT. To the Senator from North Dakota making a statement. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I wish to say that I am obliged to leave the city this evening at 6.45 o'clock, and I had hoped that a vote could be taken upon the treaties before that time. I am in favor of the resolution of ratification offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, but unless the vote is had to-day I will not have an opportunity to vote for it. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if it is not possible to so arrange matters that the vote can be had to-night?

Mr. GALLINGER. Regular order!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Michigan as modified by the Senator from Massachusetts, that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SHIVELY. I rise to a point of order, Mr. President.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana rises to a point of order, which he will state.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, I understand that the vote just taken was on an amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the motion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment was accepted by the Senator from Michigan, and the vote was on the motion as modified.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from North Dakota has in a personal matter addressed the Senator from Massachusetts, and I think he is entitled to a reply.

Mr. LODGE. In the confusion I did not hear the question.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I directed an inquiry to the Senator from Massachusetts, if it would not be possible to have this matter go on so that we could have a vote this evening?

Mr. LODGE. Why not have it go on?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. I would be only too glad to have it go on. I should like to get a vote; and I am perfectly ready to stay here until we get it.

Mr. PENROSE. Regular order!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I have been interrupted so often during my discussion, and I am afraid that I have omitted a number of things I had intended to say, and Senators have been very patient and attentive and I willingly yield the floor to others better qualified than myself to discuss the merits of this controversy. I yield to the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT].

Mr. ROOT obtained the floor.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me for a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. As we have voted down the motion to take a recess, I think we ought at this time to have a sort of understanding that we will stay here and complete this matter to-night, and if it is in order I would make the motion that we proceed with and complete the discussion and vote before adjournment to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the order of business under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. BACON addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. ROOT. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from New York desires to address the Senate. It is now 10 minutes to 6 o'clock, and I understand there are two or three other Senators who wish to speak. I do not desire to put anyone to inconvenience, but I think at the end of two days my request to fix a time is not an unreasonable one. So I again ask unanimous consent that the vote on the treaties, the resolutions, and all amendments pending or to be offered, shall be taken not later than 5 o'clock to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar day of March 7?

Mr. LODGE. The calendar day of March 7.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I would suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that he say not later than 4 o'clock.

Mr. LODGE. I heretofore suggested not later than 4 o'clock, and there was objection, so I pushed it up until 5 o'clock, although 4 o'clock would suit me.

Mr. PENROSE (to Mr. LODGE). Make it 2 o'clock.

Mr. WILLIAMS. My idea was that we might begin to vote at 4 o'clock and get away at some reasonable time.

Mr. LODGE. I am certainly willing to make it 4 o'clock, but that was objected to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Suppose the Senator renews his request fixing the hour at 15 minutes after 4. That will answer the purpose.

Mr. LODGE. Then, Mr. President, I will ask unanimous consent that the vote be taken at 4 o'clock to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts modifies his request so as to fix the time for the vote at 4 o'clock to-morrow, the request otherwise to be the same as stated by him. Is there objection?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether we can not get a unanimous-consent agreement to vote at 2 o'clock?

Mr. GALLINGER. Objection was made to 4 o'clock just now. Mr. PENROSE. I did not understand that. I did not hear it. The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I object.

Mr. LODGE. Then I make the request that the vote be had at 5 o'clock to-morrow, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request that the debate be closed at 5 o'clock to-morrow and a vote taken at that time?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I object. I think, Mr. President, we ought to go on to-morrow until we finish the question, but I am opposed to fixing a specific time for the vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then let us stay in session to-night.

Mr. LODGE. Then, Mr. President, we have no choice except to stay in session now.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York is entitled to the floor and is awaiting the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, one moment. I think if the Senator from Massachusetts will suggest that we meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow and vote not later than half past 5 an agreement can be reached.

Mr. LODGE. Very well. Mr. President, I understand if the suggestion is made to meet at 11 o'clock and vote not later than half past 5, we can get an agreement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I think we have made every effort to reach an agreement.

Mr. LODGE (to Mr. WILLIAMS). Do not object to that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I shall object to it. Since gentlemen have made their beds they can lie in them.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I think it my duty to express in a manner which I hope the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] will regard as both moderate and brief my advocacy of the adoption of the resolution last offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], under which the pending treaties with Great Britain and France will be ratified with a construction to be made a part of the instrument of ratification. Before stating the reasons for my agreement to that resolution, I wish to spread upon the record of the Senate a portion of the document which was presented by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] on the 8th of February, being Senate Document No. 298, Sixty-second Congress, second session. This document contains the address of the Secretary of State, Mr. Knox, before the American Society of Judicial Settlement of International Disputes at Cincinnati on the 8th of November, 1911. That speech was a public expression by the negotiator of the treaty on behalf of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. My interruption is not for the purpose of asking a question, but I understand that the Senator from New York would rather not go on to-night, and I now understand that if the Senator from Massachusetts will make a request to take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow, and to vote not later than 4 o'clock to-morrow afternoon, it will be acceded to.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Four thirty p. m. to-morrow.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I made the request that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow, and that a vote be taken not later than half past 4.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The vote to be taken otherwise as provided in the existing unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to inquire what assurance a Senator would have that he would be permitted to make even a short address under the terms of such an agreement?

Mr. LODGE. He has all day between 12 o'clock and half past 4.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is rather a limited time, and it is quite possible for one Senator to occupy that whole period.

Mr. LODGE. I do not know of anybody on this side who is going to speak, except the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. Of course, I do not know how much time the Senator from Nebraska desires to occupy.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should not desire over 20 minutes, and possibly not that much.

Mr. LODGE. There can be no doubt that the Senator will have 20 minutes, and a great deal more, if he desires.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am sure there are a number of Senators on this side of the Chamber who desire to speak, and I think the only objection to the request for unanimous consent is due to that fact.

Mr. LODGE. I appeal to the Senator not to object. I am speaking not so much for myself as for other Senators who are being put to the utmost inconvenience by this delay.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? [A pause.] The Chair hears no objection, and the order is entered.

Thereupon (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate, as in open executive session, took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, March 7, 1912, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 6, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty Father, prepare us in Thine own way for the duties before us, for whether in the body or out of the body we face the unknown; the present alone is ours; we know not what the next moment, the next hour, the next week has in store. But Thou hast never failed us, even though we have proved recreant to the trust reposed in us. Help us, therefore, with renewed faith and confidence to do the things next to us, and do them in the spirit, leaving the results to Thee who doest all things well. And Thine be the praise, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. HANNA] and myself be allowed to extend our remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. AKIN] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. HANNA] and himself be allowed to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman upon what subject.

The SPEAKER. Upon what subject does the gentleman from New York desire to extend his remarks?

Mr. AKIN of New York. On the subject on which I spoke on February 29.

The SPEAKER. What was the subject?

Mr. AKIN of New York. It was in regard to post-office matters.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York states that he desires to extend his remarks on the subject on which he spoke on February 29. Is there objection?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Is that the same matter about which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] had some little controversy?

Mr. AKIN of New York. I can answer the gentleman by saying I do not think any individual Member has the right to censor my speech. I have never censored anybody.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I wanted to ask the gentleman whether that is a question upon which he and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] had their controversy?

Mr. AKIN of New York. The objectionable part is all in.

Mr. OLMSTED. I think the objection of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] was to something that the gentleman from New York [Mr. AKIN] had already said. The gentleman from Massachusetts wanted him to eliminate the matter.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not think I will have any objection, but I want to ask the gentleman one further question. Is it the gentleman's intention to refer by name to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FAIRCHILD]?

Mr. AKIN of New York. I am under the impression that from now on I will see it does not appear in the extension of my remarks, if that is what you want to do.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. With that understanding, I will have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. AKIN]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

COMMITTEE ON ELECTIONS NO. 3.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration and adoption of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 440.

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections No. 3 have leave to sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

MANEUVER CAMP NEAR TULLAHOMA, TENN.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the unfinished business was House joint resolution 118, called up by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY], of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 118) authorizing the Secretary of War to accept the title to approximately 5,000 acres of land in the vicinity of Tullahoma, in the State of Tennessee, which certain citizens have offered to donate to the United States for the purpose of establishing a maneuver camp and for the maneuvering of troops, establishing and maintaining camps of instruction, for rifle and Artillery ranges, and for mobilization and assembling of troops from the group of States composed of Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, North Carolina, and South Carolina.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire whether anybody desires any time on this resolution or not?

Mr. MANN. I think we will want a little time.

Mr. HAY. How much?

Mr. MANN. I do not know exactly.

Mr. HAY. Half an hour on a side?

Mr. MANN. I think that would be enough, probably.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there may be one-half hour on a side on this resolution, at which time the resolution may be read under the five-minute rule, and that one half of the time be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks that general debate on House joint resolution No. 118 be limited to one hour, one-half of the time to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and that after that the resolution be read for consideration under the five-minute rule. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAY. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON].

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, this joint resolution that has been read before the House is for the purpose of establishing a maneuver camp for the maneuvering of troops, establishing and maintaining camps of instruction for rifle and Artillery ranges, and for the mobilization and assembling of troops from the group of States composed of Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, North Carolina, and South Carolina.

During the last session of Congress there was a resolution pending before this House proposing to cede or donate to the United States Government 5,000 acres of land situated near Tullahoma, Tenn., the land which is now proposed to be donated to the Federal Government. The passage of that resolution was recommended by the then Secretary of War. There was a resolution agreed upon by the friends of that resolution, and also a resolution introduced for the purpose of investigating Chickamauga, with reference to establishing a rifle range and maneuvering grounds there, which passed Congress. As a result of this a board of engineers, composed of Army officers, was appointed for the purposes of examining the two places and reporting as to the advisability and practicability and fitness of those places, or either one of them, for the purposes enumerated.

That board of Army officers made a report, and reported that the site at Tullahoma was admirably adapted for a rifle range and camps of instruction, and advised the acceptance of the proposed tract of 5,000 acres for the purpose of establishing a small-arms rifle range of sufficient size to accommodate the national rifle competition. They therefore reported that for the purpose of establishing and maintaining camps of instruction and for the purpose of securing a site for a mobilization camp in time of war. They reported that the tract was not large enough for the maneuvering grounds, but recited the fact in that report that there was a large amount of land adjacent to it that could be bought very cheaply and, whether it was bought or not, it could be used with very little damage to those owning and occupying the land, and at small cost to the Government.

Now, the object of this resolution is to donate 5,000 acres of land for the purpose of establishing a maneuvering ground, camp of instruction, rifle range, and so forth. I want to state frankly to the Members of this House that there is nothing involved in this proposition except the donation of 5,000 acres of land to the Federal Government for the purpose of establishing this rifle range, and so forth. Furthermore, to be candid and frank, I will say that if the Government accepts this land the people of Tennessee, my constituents, and those residing near this location, would be very glad to see money invested by the Government for the improvement of this tract of land for the purposes named. Whether or not that is done, we believe we can realize a great benefit from this rifle range if the land is accepted by the Government by the use of the funds in control of the State. We have on hand now about $15,000, I believe it is, and under section 1661 of the Revised Statutes we are authorized to use this money for the purpose of improving this ground as a rifle range for target practice, and so forth.

Now, we expect the State of Tennessee to use this money upon the improvement of this land if the Government accepts this cession and donation of land. That will make a rifle range and camp for the assembling of troops and target practice that will be quite sufficient for a beginning, that will afford a very fine opportunity for the drilling and practicing of the militia of Tennessee and of the group of States that are named in this resolution.

The report of this board of engineers sets forth the fact, in very convincing terms, that this land is admirably adapted for these purposes. So far as the location is concerned, there is not a healthier location in the Union. It is on the Highland rim of the Cumberland Mountains, or Cumberland Plateau, and the land is of such a character and of such value that more of it can be procured at a reasonable price. If there is no occasion or disposition on the part of the Government to buy more land so that it can be used for a maneuvering ground, still there is 25,000 or 50,000 or 100,000 acres between this rim and the base of the Cumberland Mountains that could be used for the practice of large guns. No better could be found in the whole Union.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. HOUSTON. With pleasure.

Mr. HELM. What railroad transportation facilities have you?

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, this land lies alongside the Nashville & Chattanooga Railroad. At Tullahoma there is a branch of that road coming into this railroad from Sparta, Tenn.

Mr. HELM. The same system of railroads?

Mr. HOUSTON. The same system of railroads; and this railroad, the Nashville & Chattanooga Railroad, is being double tracked from Nashville to Chattanooga, and it is one of the best equipped roads in the Union.

Mr. HELM. A single line of railroad.

Mr. HOUSTON. A single line of railroad, but will be a double-track road. So far as the transportation facilities are concerned, they will be admirable. The connections with all the group of States mentioned in this resolution are excellent. At Chattanooga, 75 miles away, there are various connecting roads. At Nashville, about 75 miles the other way, the connection is made with two or more systems of roads connecting especially with the States mentioned in the resolution. With these connections at Chattanooga and at Nashville, and that road being double tracked, it makes ample railroad facilities for the transportation of soldiers.

Mr. HELM. May I ask the gentleman further what is the ultimate aim of the parties in interest in donating this 5,000 acres of land?

Mr. HOUSTON. The aim is a patriotic one. It is desired to furnish to the Government the best site for a rifle range and a maneuver ground that can be found in the States mentioned in the resolution.

Mr. HELM. The gentleman from Tennessee, of course, is aware of the fact that the Government has on foot a proposition to spend $13,000,000 in the Appalachian Forest Reserve?

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that legislation of that sort has been proposed.

Mr. HELM. Is this within the zone of the Appalachian Forest Reserve?

Mr. HOUSTON. I suppose the Appalachian Reserve is something like 150 miles away, and that would be as close as the Appalachian Forest Reserve would come to it.

Mr. HELM. I should like to ask the gentleman one further question. What troops are quartered anywhere within 100 miles of this?

Mr. HOUSTON. I am not able to give the gentleman that information. But the object of this resolution is to establish a place where troops can be encamped and mobilized for the States named, and the fact that they have none very near is one of the strongest arguments that we offer why we should have this one established.

Mr. HELM. What I am trying to get at is how far troops will have to come in order to reach this place. Where will the troops come from who will go there to drill?

Mr. HOUSTON. It depends on the particular place in the United States from which they are sent. I am not able to inform the gentleman on that.

Mr. HELM. What mobile Army post is near to this?

Mr. HOUSTON. I suppose the post at Fort Oglethorpe, in the State of Georgia, would be the nearest.

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman will allow me, the proposed Appalachian Park will not go west of Knoxville, 150 or 200 miles away.

Mr. HOUSTON. I believe that is correct.

Mr. SIMS. In other words, it is much nearer to Oglethorpe than this.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Can the gentleman inform me how far this ground is from Oglethorpe?

Mr. HOUSTON. I suppose between 85 and 90 miles.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. How much ground is open for these same purposes at Oglethorpe?

Mr. HOUSTON. I am not able to answer the gentleman, but I have the report of the Army engineers here which says that that is not suitable ground for this purpose. They were appointed to examine that ground there, and also at Tullahoma, and they report that the situation at Oglethorpe is not desirable for this purpose, and that the situation at Tullahoma is most desirable.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is in the same State, is it not?

Mr. HOUSTON. No, sir; Oglethorpe is in Georgia and this is in Tennessee.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is the same kind of country and the same kind of soil?

Mr. HOUSTON. Altogether a different kind of country. This is a plateau, a level piece of land on the first bench of the mountain, on what we call the rim of the Cumberlands. It is not composed of hills and valleys and hollows; it is mostly level.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman says they reported adversely on Oglethorpe?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes; at Chickamauga.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is the same thing.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is about 12 miles distant in the State of Georgia. They reported that the location at Chickamauga practically was not suited to the establishment of a rifle range and maneuvering ground, and advised against its establishment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is this land to be donated by some parties to the United States Government for the purpose of a rifle range?

Mr. HOUSTON. It is to be donated to the Government for the purpose of establishing the range. The State will cooperate with the Government under the law as it now exists, section 1661 of the Revised Statutes, which provides that it may do that, and that the State may use its own funds in connection with the Federal Government.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Has the State a rifle range at this point?

Mr. HOUSTON. It has no rifle range at this point, nor at any other.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Has the State purchased this land?

Mr. HOUSTON. No; it belongs to different individuals. The people who own it propose to give it. The Board of Trade of Tullahoma have options on a number of farms, and they propose to buy them and donate it to the Government if the Government will accept it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Has the Army Board of Engineers reported on it as entirely suitable for a rifle range?

Mr. HOUSTON. I will read to the gentleman what is said about it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will there be any expenditure required to make it suitable?

Mr. HOUSTON. The land will have to be cleared up and prepared for the location of camps, and so forth.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Have they natural butts in the shape of hills or mountains to stop projectiles so that they will not kill a man in the next county?

Mr. HOUSTON. They have the most admirable butts that can be found in the country; they have the Cumberland Mountain range 700 or 800 feet high to shoot their bullets against.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOUSTON. Certainly.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield time for me to ask the gentleman from Texas a question?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. HAY. I will yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to emphasize the fact that it is recommended by the Secretary of War, by a former Secretary of War, and a Board of Engineers composed of Army officers.

Mr. AUSTIN. Is this the unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. HOUSTON. It is; and the Secretary of War recommends the acceptance of this land. And the Secretary of War in submitting that report of the Army officers to the President says:

To carry out the policy of bringing together into camps of instruction regular troops and Organized Militia, it is of the utmost importance to the Government to own suitable sites for such camps.

The report goes on to set out the fact that it is admirably adapted for this purpose. You will find that this is the most suitable place for the gathering together of troops, the most healthful and best watered place that could be found in all the country. This section of country is a health resort; people go there from all sections to find health and strength.

I want to say that I have an amendment that I want to offer to the bill when it is read under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to establish a maneuver camp at Tullahoma, Tenn. The last bill that we acted upon on Calendar Wednesday was to establish a brigade camp or post in Tennessee—

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In Georgia.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon, it was a bill introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] that we passed, providing for a brigade post in his district; a part of it is in Georgia and a part of it is in Tennessee.

Mr. HAY. It was in Chickamauga Park.

Mr. MANN. I know what the situation is. I do not wonder that gentlemen are somewhat restive under the proposition, and yet they ought not to be; it only shows the exceeding great activity of the Members from Tennessee.

On one day they put through a bill for a brigade post in their locality, the only bill of the kind that has been passed through the House in years, and on the next day they propose to put through a bill to establish a maneuver camp, the only bill of the kind that has been or will be reported, probably, or passed. They have been exceedingly active. Gentlemen ought not to think it a reflection upon them when they are grabbing off so much for their State. On last Wednesday we passed a proposition to direct the War Department to report upon the advisability of establishing a maneuver camp near Anniston, Ala., to cover precisely the same States that it is proposed to cover by this maneuver camp. It was the same proposition. No one expects that there will be a maneuver camp at both places. Gentlemen from Tennessee reported a proposition to have the War Department report upon Anniston, while at the same time they were slipping the knife into the proposition by getting a report to really establish a maneuver camp in Tennessee. All the discussion the other day was idle waste of time if this resolution is to be passed, as I assume it is. Both resolutions were reported unanimously from the great Committee on Military Affairs. It is impossible to put both into final execution.

I do not know where the maneuver camp ought to be or whether there ought to be one at all, but it seems to me that it is a part of wise legislation when you have ordered a report upon one proposition to wait until you get the report before you determine upon something that entirely eradicates any need of the report. If this camp be established, there is no occasion for the maneuver camp at Anniston, because both are to serve the National Guard of the same States.

I now yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] to explain in a moment why this is done, and in my time.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I can say to the gentleman that, as a matter of fact, the acceptance of this land, donated as it is by the citizens of Tullahoma and the vicinity, will not interfere with Congress accepting any lands, if it chooses to do so, in Alabama, because this resolution imposes no obligation upon this Congress or any future Congress to enlarge these lands or to spend any money upon them unless future investigations shall determine the necessity and the wisdom of making such improvements.

Mr. MANN. Oh, of course we are not required to do anything with the land, but why do we accept it? We accept it for a purpose. Does the gentleman mean to say that there is no intention to carry out the purpose?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman from Illinois has been kind enough to yield me time in which to make an explanation. I will say to the gentleman in brief, that Gen. Maloney, the adjutant general of the State of Tennessee, stated in the hearings held by the Committee on Military Affairs that there is no permanent place in Tennessee where the militia can be maneuvered and given proper practice. It is absolutely necessary to carry the militia to Chickamauga Park in order to have a field large enough for maneuvering purposes, and he proposes, under section 1661, to apply about $12,000 or $15,000 of money now in his hands toward putting this land in proper shape for maneuvers and target practice. It will not only be subject to the use of the Federal troops, but, with the consent of the War Department, will be for the use of the State militia as well as the militia of the other States in the southeastern division.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the purpose of the gentlemen is to establish a maneuver camp for the benefit of the National Guard of Tennessee, the land ought to be donated to the State of Tennessee and not to the General Government. But the purpose is indicated by the resolution itself. It is to establish a maneuver camp for the maneuvering of troops, and so forth, from the group of States composed of Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, North Carolina, and South Carolina; that is, a maneuver camp for the National Guard of all these States. Would anyone here propose—and that is what I yielded to have answered—to establish a maneuver camp at this point for the National Guard of all these States, and then turn around next week and establish a maneuver camp at Anniston for the benefit of the troops of the same State?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I heard the statement of the adjutant general before the Committee on Military Affairs. I fully agree with the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that the only purpose of this resolution is that at some time possibly the United States Government may expend some money on this proposition and develop it. Yet at the same time, as I understand the situation, the business men of Tullahoma and others interested have secured options upon this land. It is desired to have it as a maneuver ground, and we asked the question of the adjutant general, Why not donate this to the State, just as the gentleman from Illinois has now asked the question? He said:

If the National Government will not accept it, of course we will donate it to the State, but we prefer to have the National Government own it for the avowed purpose that possibly at some time they will use it as a national training camp.

But at the same time it does not seem to me to impose any obligation on the National Government to so use it if they do not want to do so.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman mean to contend that Congress would play a confidence game on these people and pass a resolution accepting their gift for the purpose of establishing a maneuver camp and for the maneuvering of troops, and so forth, from a group of States composed of all of those States with no intention of carrying that into effect? That would be a plain confidence game, and I am sure that no gentleman in this House would be a party to a confidence game of that sort.

Mr. HELM and Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield, if to anybody?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. HELM. Can the gentleman from Illinois tell the House how many troops, if any, are stationed in Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, North and South Carolina?

Mr. MANN. I am unable to give the gentleman the information asked for. Some member of the Committee on Military Affairs can give it, probably in very short language, and I yield for that purpose for half a minute.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs if it is not a fact that in this group of States there are only two States in the group that have a mobile Army post, one in Kentucky—and that has been abandoned—and in Georgia they have two or more, and have ample ground on which to conduct the maneuvers?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs I will say that I do not recall any other station for the mobile Army. The question of the gentleman, I suppose, did not go to the Coast Artillery?

Mr. HELM. Yes; it simply applies to Kentucky, and there is no coast in Kentucky or Tennessee.

Mr. SLAYDEN. But there is in North Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, and Louisiana, and this is intended to apply only to the mobile Army, of course.

Mr. HELM. As a matter of fact—

Mr. SLAYDEN. I know of no other, except Fort Thomas, Ky.

Mr. HELM. And that has been abandoned.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And Fort McPherson and Fort Oglethorpe, Ga.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield to me enough time to ask the gentleman from Texas another question?

Mr. MANN. It depends upon how long it takes to answer it. I yielded for a half a minute, and they have taken two minutes.

Mr. HELM. I would like for the gentleman from Texas to inform the House what it costs to equip one of these rifle ranges or maneuvering grounds?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I regret to say I can not inform the gentleman, because it depends upon the topography of the ground. You may have to erect artificial butts where you are out on a plain, or you may have to cut into the side of a mountain.

Mr. HELM. Can the gentleman suggest any rifle range where an adequate equipment has been installed and state what has been the cost of it?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am sorry to say I can not. The only one I have personal knowledge of is in Texas, and there it cost nothing, because they had a mountain side against which to shoot.

Mr. HELM. I thought they had a target arrangement.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Where?

Mr. HELM. On these rifle ranges.

Mr. SLAYDEN. They do have them.

Mr. HELM. Do not they cost anything?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Oh, certainly; but they are not very expensive.

Mr. PEPPER. It is claimed that the cost of an adequate rifle range would be $30,000. I will say The Adjutant General, as has already been stated, gave it as the special intention to spend $15,000 of that money from the State's portion on the rifle range.

And now I want to say further to the gentleman from Illinois that, as I understand this proposition, it does not involve any great amount of expenditure except for the rifle range. They are not going to put up any buildings there. It is just for the summer camp of the National Guard and the Regular Army when they meet in joint maneuvers.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman entirely misunderstands what I say if he thinks I am attempting to determine where the maneuver camp should be. But here is a committee which one week asks the department to report information in regard to a maneuver camp at Anniston, Ala., and the next week proposes to pass a resolution locating that maneuver camp at some other point. What is the logic of that? What is the purpose of calling on the department for the information? I was not in favor of the resolution calling on the department for information, but I was overruled by the consensus of opinion in the House, and we have asked the department for it. Why should we not wait until we obtain the information in order to see whether we should locate the maneuver camp at Tullahoma or at Anniston?

Mr. McKELLAR. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. The report was before the committee that unless this matter was accepted at this time the party who had some options on the land could not give them. If the Government has them, and should afterwards determine that the Anniston site is a better site, it could accept the Anniston site and establish a maneuver camp there. There is no inconsistency about it. It just has the choice of two places, where otherwise it would have the choice of one.

Mr. MANN. I would say that it was an inconsistency to accept a maneuver site at one place unless it was intended to utilize the camp for that purpose. Do I understand the gentleman to say that we have the moral right to accept every donation made at their expense, with no intention to carry out what they have a right to expect? I would not be a party to such a transaction, public or private, under any circumstances.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman yield for a statement?

Mr. MANN. If it is not too long.

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, it will be short. I wish to say this, that there is not at this time any antagonism between the effort to establish a rifle range and camp at Tullahoma and establishing the same at Anniston, Ala.

Mr. MANN. I have observed that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Houston] supported the Anniston proposition, and that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Blackmon] is not opposed to this proposition. What does that mean? It means that they want to establish two maneuver camps—one at Tullahoma and one at Anniston—for the same purpose. That is what I am opposed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to say that I supported the proposition to have the board of engineers examine the location at Anniston, Ala., because I thought it was honest and fair and just that I should do so. We came before this House at the last session of Congress asking that this same thing be done for Tullahoma, Tenn., and that we might have a report. The report was made. Now, then, I can not say in good faith and candor that the people of Anniston, Ala., shall not have the same opportunity to have an investigation in order to see what the conditions are there.

Mr. MANN. You ought to wait. You are trying to preclude the people of Alabama from getting a maneuver camp by having your own accepted at this time.

Mr. HOUSTON. Not at all—not at this time. I am trying to make all the headway possible. There is no reason why this would preclude Anniston, Ala. If the Government accepts this 5,000 acres of land, and it seems proper then to accept 5,000 more from Anniston, Ala., it has the discretion to improve and extend the one most desirable. If Tullahoma can not beat it on its merits, then we ought not to have it; but if it can, we ought to have it.

Mr. MANN. If the Government accepts a donation of land at the expense of private individuals, and then does not use the land for the purpose for which it is donated, I repeat again it is a confidence game on the part of the Government to which no gentleman ought to be a party. I take it if this land is accepted it is the express intention of Congress to provide at this place maneuver ground for these States. Now, if the gentlemen are so anxious, I will withhold the balance of my time and let them explain.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Blackmon].

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Chairman, I have only a few words to say with reference to this proposition at Tullahoma, Tenn. I am not engaging, and I would not engage, in a confidence game, but I think this, that the proposition from Tullahoma, Tenn., is a remarkably liberal one, and at this time it is more liberal than I expect to offer at Anniston, Ala., unless the Government proposes to do something for me.

Now, with reference to Tullahoma, Tenn., they propose to donate 5,000 acres of land. They ask the Government to accept it. I am not going to offer 5,000 acres of land at Anniston, Ala., unless the Government will agree, in accepting it, to give me something in return for it. That is the position I take on this question.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. BLACKMON. I do.

Mr. MURDOCK. Why does any set of men propose to give 5,000 acres of land to the Government? What benefit do they get out of it?

Mr. BLACKMON. The question answers itself.

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not think it does.

Mr. BLACKMON. If they give this land they hope to get something in return for it, just as other people do in giving a bonus for an industry that will bring money into the community.

Mr. MURDOCK. Do they expect something else to follow this grant?

Mr. BLACKMON. I do not say that. Alabama is not following Tennessee.

Mr. MANN. You have skinned them. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLACKMON. No. If this proposition is submitted to the War Department, I believe that the War Department as it is now constituted will be absolutely fair in this matter. I do not believe that Tennessee, Illinois, or any other State in the Union can cause the War Department to put up a job on the people. I do not believe they will do it, and for myself I am willing to take my chances on the report, if we ever get it. I believe that the advantages at Anniston are far superior to those at Tullahoma, Tenn., but I am willing for the War Department to determine that question for itself.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. BLACKMON. I can not. I have not the time.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Just for a question?

Mr. BLACKMON. It seems I must do so, but I have only a very few minutes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute more to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Blackmon] to enable him to answer the question of the gentleman from South Dakota.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Blackmon] has one more minute.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The question I wanted to ask the gentleman was this: Does the gentleman anticipate that both of these maneuvering camps will be established?

Mr. BLACKMON. I should say not.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. If the Government has accepted the one in Tennessee is there very much likelihood that it will also take the one from Alabama?

Mr. BLACKMON. I am looking at this from this standpoint: I do not consider that the Government gets anything by this bill. I do not agree that you can cede land in a State by an act of Congress or resolution of this kind. The State of Tennessee, when the report comes in favoring Anniston, will say, "We will never cede this 5,000 acres to the Government," which must be done, of course, if the Government acquires title.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. And unless the State cedes it to the Government this bill will not be effective?

Mr. BLACKMON. No. No private party can cede jurisdiction over land to the Government. It must be done by an act of the legislature of the State.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. If the Government does not get this land it will be because the State of Tennessee will keep it back, because this resolution directs the Secretary of War to acquire this land.

Mr. BLACKMON. It directs the Secretary of War to take steps to acquire title to it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to use some of his time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON].

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Illinois for his courtesy.

I do not understand just how the gentleman means to employ the term "confidence game." I do not know just what he means by that statement. But I want to state that in my remarks at the outset I stated that I would be perfectly frank and candid, and would say that if this land were ceded to the Government, and the Government accepted the donation, we would expect and we would hope that the Government might be induced to make further investments, and the report shows it can buy more land at a reasonable price. That is not a confidence game. If our showing of facts does not make it appear to the Government that it is a proper place at which to establish this rifle range, then the proposition ought to fall. There is nothing in that which is not fair and candid and frank.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, this resolution comes here practically with the indorsement of a Republican Congress, the Sixty-first, which first passed upon it. It comes with the unanimous indorsement of the Military Committee of a Republican House. Then it is here now with the indorsement of and a unanimous report from the Military Committee of a Democratic House. It has the approval of a commission of Army officers who have been upon the ground and have studied not only the local situation but the needs and requirements of the service. It has the approval of two Secretaries of War, one a Democrat, Hon. Jacob M. Dickinson, of Tennessee, and the present Secretary, who made a very excellent speech last night in the home town of the gentleman [Mr. MANN] who is opposing this proposition. [Applause.]

Something has been said in this connection about Tennessee. Tennessee is the banner volunteer State when it comes to furnish soldiers for the defense of the Union, and the town that I represent on the floor of this House stood next to New York City in the number of recruits during the Spanish-American War. The smallest county in the district that I represent, having 2,200 voters in it, furnished over 500 private soldiers to the Spanish-American War. So, basing this proposition from that standpoint, Tennessee has a superior claim, which I hope will be recognized by both sides of the House.

I made it a rule in this House, Mr. Speaker, to follow the report of a committee where it is a unanimous report. I stand by my colleagues on this side of the House when they come here a unit for any proposition, no matter what section of the country it benefits. If we are to have intelligent legislation, we must depend on our committees, and have confidence in their honor and their interest in the public service of the country.

A rifle range is needed not only from the standpoint of the report of a commission of Army officers for the Regular Army, but it is needed for the State militia of the National Guard of the Southern States. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, it is very interesting indeed to observe the plan of economy that is being worked out in regard to the handling of our standing Army by the Democratic Committee on Military Affairs of this House. We were told early in the session that our present system of handling our standing Army was extravagant, and in consonance with that sort of a suggestion one of the first things done by this committee, backed up by the Democratic majority, was to announce to the country by a bill, which has passed the House, that it was reducing the Cavalry arm of the service one-third, from 15 regiments down to 10. Immediately following this legislation, notwithstanding they are proposing to eliminate 5 of the 15 Cavalry regiments, and notwithstanding we have splendid Cavalry posts, constructed within the past 10 years, to house nicely the entire 15 regiments, they put through a bill increasing the capacity of the Cavalry post at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., from 1 regiment to 3 regiments, or a brigade post, meaning the expenditure of all the way from $2,000,000 to $4,000,000.

What happens next? A bill passes the House authorizing the Secretary of War to investigate and report upon the feasibility of taking over a maneuver camp down in Alabama. That has been passed. Now we are invited to consider the acceptance of 5,000 acres of land to establish a maneuver camp in the State of Tennessee. What is it going to cost the Government if it accepts this land and proceeds in good faith to establish that maneuver camp? No one knows. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is conspicuously absent from this room as these questions are being propounded.

Mr. PEPPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I am sorry to say I have not time to yield. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], with long service on the Military Committee, frankly confesses that he does not know what it would cost. We are embarking under Democratic leadership upon unknown expenditures running into the millions after a declaration of economy to be adopted by the Committee on Military Affairs.

We have heard a great deal said about political posts, and it has been intimated that some of the present posts were not established by the Secretary of War or the Army Board, but by acts of Congress for political purposes. Are not every one of these recent enterprises started for purposes purely political? Of what need is there for two maneuver posts or grounds, one in Alabama and one in Tennessee, for the same series of States, unless it is for political maneuvers? It has no necessity in the proper handling of the standing Army or the State militia. If this is the type of economy projected into the management of military affairs by legislation of Congress directing these things to be done, we will need some imagination to anticipate where will be the end and to what extravagance of expenditure we are to be led by the Democratic leadership of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, how much time has this side remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. KITCHIN). Nine minutes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will ask the Chair to let me know when I have used two minutes. Mr. Speaker, I want to say in reply to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] that while there was no minority report filed, the Committee on Military Affairs was not unanimous in its opinion as to the wisdom of these projects, but, as frequently happens, a small minority refrained from filing views that run counter to that of an overwhelming majority of the committee.

The gentleman insinuated that the committee is undertaking legislation along sectional lines, that it proposes construction in the South that it would not consent to in the North. I want to remind him that the proposed schemes of economy that he complains of are the inventions of the major general who is Chief of Staff, Gen. Leonard Wood, and Secretary Stimson, both of whom I believe are admittedly Republicans in politics, if Gen. Wood has any politics whatever.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I can not, I have so short a time. The gentleman from South Dakota asked a question as to the probable cost of the enlargement of quarters and barracks at Fort Oglethorpe for two additional regiments of Cavalry. He knows that it is impossible to tell that until the types of buildings have been agreed upon. But I want to say that we have reduced by specific mandate of law the cost of such buildings to be erected hereafter. That has been done in this House by legislation proposed by the committee that he criticizes now in an unfriendly spirit. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Tennessee, Judge HOUSTON, in whose district this land lies, has explained to the House the purpose of this resolution. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] it seems to me has misconceived the purpose of this resolution. He seems to find some ground of criticism in the fact that this bill follows a bill passed last Wednesday providing for a brigade post at Chickamauga. My friend has fallen into the error of stating that that brigade post is to be located in the State of Tennessee. That post is to be located in Chickamauga Park, in the State of Georgia, just across the line from Chattanooga, Tenn.

Now, I want to say to the House that there is nothing behind this proposition. It carries with it no obligation on the part of Congress to spend any money upon the site at Tullahoma unless in the judgment of Congress it is the part of wisdom to do so.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. How many acres will be required for maneuver grounds altogether?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That will depend upon the kind of maneuver grounds to be provided.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Will it take 20,000 or 30,000 acres?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I was about to state that if the maneuver grounds are required for Artillery purposes the War Department requires from 25,000 to 40,000 acres of land.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Why would it not be wise before you permit it to be bought by the Government, to know how much the Government is going to pay for the balance?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This is not a proposition to buy 5,000 acres of land; it is proposed to donate 5,000 acres to the Government.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Beware of the Greeks bearing gifts. Why would it not be wise to wait before the Government is committed to the acceptance of this 5,000 acres to know whether the State of Tennessee will cede the sovereignty over 25,000 or 30,000 acres, and know how much the Government will have to pay for it?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The report of the board of Army officers shows that this land can be purchased very cheap, at about $10 or $12.50 an acre, if the United States Government should desire in the future to buy more land.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. What is it worth? Is it worth over a dollar an acre? It may not be worthy anything except for a maneuver camp, and practically nothing for farming purposes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The report of the Board of Army Engineers shows that the land is reasonably worth $10 or $12.50 per acre, and that it can be bought for that sum.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I was against the resolution last week, because I thought there ought to be a committee of Army officers sent out to select the best place, the cheapest place, the most available place in that cluster of States, and that that should be taken, and that we should not be committed to several of them at the same time.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is exactly the course that has been followed in this instance. A resolution was passed in the Sixty-first Congress authorizing a board of Army officers to go down to Tennessee and Georgia and investigate this and other sites.

I was about to say that the War Department is now urging every State to select a permanent site for mobilization purposes and for camp instruction. The adjutant general of the State of Tennessee appeared before the Committee on Military Affairs and said that he had been urged by the War Department to select some place in the State of Tennessee where the militia could meet, where it could be mobilized in the event of war, or where it could meet for target practice and instruction during times of peace. He stated that he did not have the money with which to purchase and prepare lands in Tennessee for such purpose, but that if Congress would only agree to accept these 5,000 acres of land he could use about $15,000 which he has in his possession for the purpose of putting this land in good condition for rifle target practice. He says that its natural condition is such that it will not require very much money to put it into suitable condition for a militia rifle range, and that with an extra $15,000 this land can be put in proper condition for national matches, and he urged the Committee on Military Affairs, in the interest of the militia of Tennessee, who now have no permanent place to go for practice or where they can have instruction given them, to report this resolution. We are anxious that Congress shall pass it now, because the Board of Trade of Tullahoma has secured from people living in the vicinity of that city options on this land which are about to run out. Unless the United States Government accepts it now, it may possibly be too late if the matter is deferred, as some gentleman has suggested ought to be done. I see no reason why Congress should not accept it.

If in the future the United States Government shall decide, as I think it ought to decide, to establish a great maneuvering ground for the troops in the Southeastern States, just as they have recently done in Wisconsin, then I believe no better place in the South could be selected than Tullahoma; but that is a question for a future Congress to decide.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining? The SPEAKER. Four minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Illinois for this courtesy. He is not only one of the most able and useful Members of the House, but he is also exceedingly courteous and obliging at all times.

Mr. Speaker, the passage of this resolution does not pledge any Member of Congress to appropriate money for the improvement of the land in the future. I believe that if the time shall come, if it ever does, when the War Department thinks it proper to recommend that money be expended in order to secure proper maneuvering grounds for troops in the Southeastern States, Congress will see fit to accept this location, since it will have a nucleus of 5,000 acres to start with; but if it does not, the citizens of Tullahoma and the State of Tennessee will not complain. Former Secretary of War Dickinson urged the acceptance of this land in the last Congress, and the House, in the Sixty-first Congress, unanimously passed this bill. It was sent to the Senate, and there amended so as to provide for a commission of Army officers to go down and look over the land. They have made their report to Congress, in which they strongly urge the acceptance of this land. They state that it is well watered; that it is healthy and sanitary; that it is centrally located and easy of access; and that it possesses all those elements necessary for suitable and proper target rifle ranges and camps of instruction, and that it will also provide a place for mobilization whenever needed.

That it is not large enough for maneuvering purposes for Artillery I will admit, but it is large enough for mobilization of troops in the event of war. It is large enough for camps of instruction not only for the Militia of Tennessee but for the militia of any other State that desires to send its troops to that point in time of peace. It is also within easy reach of the regular soldiers located at Fort McPherson, in Georgia, where a brigade post is intended to be established, and I trust that the House will adopt the resolution. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Mr. Speaker, I was one of those who opposed the resolution a week ago which provided for the sending of a commission of Army officers down to examine a proposed site in Alabama, and we who opposed that resolution then stated that we believed it was better all around and it was the part of wisdom all around to provide a commission of Army officers to go down there to examine the various sites in the several States, see the several land companies and promoters, and pick out the most advantageous site, all things considered, price and everything else. When land companies come before committees of Congress or to the Government and offer 4,000 or 5,000 acres of land for nothing it always raises suspicion in my mind why this generosity, why this great liberality to the Government? The Government is not going around begging for something for nothing. There is always, I say always—

Mr. SLAYDEN. A negro in the woodpile?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. A negro in the woodpile. They are trying to throw a sprat to catch a mackerel. You will very often find they are trying to get 10 times what the land is worth. Beware of people who are trying to give something for nothing. Now, why would not it be in the interest of economy to wait and not commit the Government to take this 5,000 acres of land until it can find out how much the 45,000, which are necessary and which surround this, can be bought for? Why would not it be better to wait until we know that the State of Tennessee will surrender sovereignty to this 5,000 acres to the United States Government?

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman from New York permit a statement?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. For a question.

Mr. HOUSTON. That information is already furnished in the report of the Army officers.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. On what conditions will the State surrender sovereignty?

Mr. HOUSTON. I mean in reference to the power to purchase land adjacent to this; that information is already there.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Of course, if the United States Government will buy 45,000 acres surrounding this 5,000 acres which are given as a gift, on terms satisfactory to the land promoters down there, then perhaps they will persuade the authorities of the State government to surrender sovereignty to the United States.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired; all time has expired, and the Clerk will read the bill under the five-minute rule for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to accept the title to approximately 5,000 acres of land in the vicinity of Tullahoma, in the State of Tennessee, which certain citizens have offered to donate to the United States and which have been inspected by the commission authorized under the joint resolution approved February 24, 1911, for the purpose of establishing a maneuver camp and for the maneuvering of troops, establishing and maintaining camps of instruction, for rifle and artillery ranges, and for mobilization and assembling of troops from the group of States composed of Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, North Carolina, and South Carolina.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding at the end of section 1 the following:

Provided, That previous thereto the State of Tennessee shall have ceded jurisdiction over said lands to the United States."

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, that amendment does not need any explanation; it explains itself. I want to state that after that amendment is adopted, if it shall be adopted, I shall propose to strike out section 2 of the bill.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 2. That he is directed to take steps to have the State of Tennessee cede jurisdiction over said lands to the United States Government.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the second section of the bill.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAY, his motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the next committee.

When the Committee on Naval Affairs was called—

SUSPENSION FROM PROMOTION—OFFICERS OF THE NAVY NOT PROFESSIONALLY QUALIFIED.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I call up the bill S. 2004.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2004) to amend section 1505 of the Revised Statutes of the United States providing for the suspension from promotion of officers of the Navy if not professionally qualified.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1505 of the Revised Statutes be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 1505. Any officer of the Navy on the active list below the rank of commander who, upon examination for promotion, is found not professionally qualified, shall be suspended from promotion for a period of six months from the date of approval of said examination, and shall suffer a loss of numbers equal to the average six months' rate of promotion to the grade for which said officer is undergoing examination during the five fiscal years next preceding the date of approval of said examination, and upon the termination of said suspension from promotion he shall be reexamined, and in case of his failure upon such reexamination he shall be dropped from the service with not more than one year's pay: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall be effective from and after January 1, 1911."

Mr. MANN. I think we ought to have some explanation.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I will ask that the Clerk read the report of the committee containing the letter to the chairman of the committee from the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. MANN. That is not very satisfactory. Why does not the gentleman explain it?

Mr. PADGETT. My voice is in very bad condition, and I suggested it simply to save my voice. In the early history of the Navy, when the classes were small, the law provided, under section 1505 of the Revised Statutes, that when an officer came up for examination for professional qualifications, if he failed, he should be suspended for 12 months. It now happens that the classes are much larger. When the classes were small the arrangement of one year's suspension put the officer back only a few numbers, but now with the large classes of from 100 to 200 members the effect of it is to put the officer back from 100 to 200 points, so that it is a demotion or a punishment of from 2 to 5 years. It has become entirely too severe, and this provides that he shall be suspended for 6 months, which will give very severe punishment, but not so severe as the other. It has been recommended by the committee unanimously and has passed the Senate. I think it is a good measure. The punishment that is provided in this bill will be amply sufficient and will remove by its passage the severity which has grown out of the enlarged classes from the time that the law was first enacted.

There is another provision in the bill which provides:

And upon the termination of said suspension from promotion he shall be reexamined, and in case of his failure upon such reexamination he shall be dropped from the service with not more than one year's pay:

Provided, That the provisions of this act shall be effective from and after January 1, 1911.

In his letter the Secretary calls attention to that provision, as follows:

The provision of law under consideration has to do only with professional failure and does not at all involve the question of misconduct; the moral qualifications are first passed upon by the examining board and are reported upon in connection with the examination as a whole. If the misconduct shown by an officer's record is such as to require an adverse report as to his moral qualifications, then the following provision of law from the act of August 5, 1882 (22 Stat., 286), applies:

"Whenever on an inquiry had pursuant to law, concerning the fitness of an officer of the Navy for promotion, it shall appear that such officer is unfit to perform at sea the duties of the place to which it is proposed to promote him, by reason of drunkenness, or from any cause arising from his own misconduct, and having been informed of and heard upon the charges against him, he shall not be placed upon the retired list of the Navy, and if the finding of the board be approved by the President, he shall be discharged with not more than one year's pay."

So that if an officer be found morally disqualified, then, whether or not he be found professionally qualified, if the finding of the board be approved by the President, the officer is discharged with not more than one year's pay. Attention is invited to the fact that in such case, i. e., in case of a finding of moral disqualification, the discharged officer is given a year's pay, although in the case of the officer whose record is irreproachable but who fails upon his professional reexamination he is discharged without any further pay whatever. In view of this apparently adverse discrimination against the officer in the case of a final professional failure it has been thought only just to add a similar provision in the proposed modification of the law, a draft of which accompanies this letter.

I think that fully explains the scope and purpose of the bill, and I shall reserve the remainder of my time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Sisson. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the committee considered the question of increased pay—as to the number of officers whose pay would be affected by this change in the law?

Mr. PADGETT. It does not increase the pay at all.

Mr. Sisson. It increases the rapidity of promotion, and promotion increases pay, does it not?

Mr. PADGETT. If the officers were to pass their examination, this would have no effect whatever on promotion.

Mr. Sisson. In other words, this bill is for the purpose of promoting the inefficient and those who are unable professionally to pass an examination, in order that they may more easily get up to a higher grade, where they may draw a higher salary, is it not?

Mr. PADGETT. No; I think not. The effect of it is that where a man is called up for examination and fails to pass on the questions on which he is examined, under the law he is given another opportunity.

Mr. Sisson. But it is 12 months.

Mr. PADGETT. He is suspended for 12 months, which operates as a penalizing of from two to five years. This law provides he shall be suspended for 6 months, which would reduce the penalty by one-half. Now, during the 12 months of his present suspension, others coming along for examination would pass on ahead of him, but this one, at the end of 12 months, if he passed his examination, would go along in the line. Under this law he would stand his examination at the end of 6 months, and, if he passed, would proceed in the order of his promotion, with only those going in front of him who had passed during the 6 months instead of during the 12 months.

Mr. Sisson. But the fact still remains that if he is penalized 200 points for failing to pass, it would prevent his promotion for five years. It seems that for as long as five years he would remain in the grade he is now in?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. Sisson. And his pay could not be increased?

Mr. PADGETT. No; but another man would pass on in his place, and the other man's pay would be increased.

Mr. Sisson. That is true; but would it not result in the man who is professionally efficient and could stand the examination proceeding to a higher grade? And he is the man who ought to proceed to a higher grade.

Mr. PADGETT. That may be true; but—

Mr. Sisson. In other words, does it not resolve itself down to this proposition, that it is an easy mode for the inefficient to get another opportunity to get into another grade?

Mr. PADGETT. No. It resolves itself into this proposition, that where a punishment, brought about by a change in conditions, is found to be too severe and unjust, he is promoted to a place where it is fair and just. In other words, it is an adaptation of punishment to changed conditions. For instance, to illustrate: When I was a child my father dealt with me and punished me as a child, but when I got to be a young man he dealt with me on a different basis, with a different qualification, and a different punishment. That is what the Navy proposes to do. This is to adapt the punishment to the changed conditions that have been brought about by the enlarged condition of the Navy.

Mr. SISSON. In other words, there is a great deal more demand now for promotion and salaries than there was formerly? Is that it?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know that it is.

Mr. SISSON. You promote a man now after he has stood an examination, and he is not permitted to be examined again until 12 months?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. Others would go ahead and be examined in his place.

Mr. SISSON. Yes; others would go ahead and be examined in his place, but that would be by virtue of his inefficiency, would it not? The others would not be responsible for that?

Mr. PADGETT. Not at all.

Mr. SISSON. Are you going to hold the child, for example, who wants to remain so a long time, a child who is intellectually inefficient, and enable him to be the more easily promoted, when the man who is a man and who is professionally efficient would be promoted anyway? Under the present law he would be promoted.

Mr. PADGETT. Not at all. Under the present law they would pass up for examination at certain times in their service. For instance, you take the graduate midshipmen. At the end of two years they pass up for examination and promotion to ensign. The next class of graduates at the end of two years passes up for promotion as ensigns, and the next class at the end of two years passes up for examination to the grade of ensign. It is fixed by periods. Now, then, when you hold this man back two or three years you are holding him back behind perhaps two other classes, and the penalty, the punishment, is altogether too severe.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. And in many cases it is not the fault of the officers themselves?

Mr. PADGETT. No; it is not.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. It may be for some reason connected with the officer's service. The kind of service the officer may have been assigned to may have been such as not to make him efficient, or to make him inefficient. He may have contracted some disease in the service that made him physically unfit, and if he were permitted to take an examination in six months he might show that he has got rid of his disability, and he might receive promotion and not be delayed behind others.

Mr. SISSON. Those cases would be rare. They would be exceptions.

Mr. PADGETT. I will say to the gentleman that there are very few of them in fact. This affects 5 ensigns and 2 assistant surgeons.

Mr. SISSON. That is, at this time?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. Is it not true that there is a great clamor for easy promotion?

Mr. PADGETT. The promotions can only be affected by legislation, and I do not know of any legislation on that subject since 1899, when the personnel bill was passed.

Mr. SISSON. Then this law simply permits a man to have his second examination at the end of six months instead of at the end of a year?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. Therefore the purpose of it is to make it easier for the officer to be promoted.

Mr. PADGETT. Not to make it easier, but to make the punishment less severe. He has to make the same qualifications at the end of 6 months that he would have to make after 12 months. He must show the same efficiency.

Mr. SISSON. But still it renders it easier for him to get an examination, because he gets it in half the time, if he is capable of standing it?

Mr. PADGETT. He has to have the same qualifications. The examination would be the same.

Mr. SISSON. Then, why not make it 30 days?

Mr. PADGETT. The only thing is that he shall have his examination at the end of 6 months instead of at the end of 12 months.

Mr. SISSON. Why not make it 30 days, then?

Mr. PADGETT. Because that would make the penalty too light.

Mr. SISSON. It is not the fault of the law that the man is unable to stand examination?

Mr. PADGETT. No.

Mr. SISSON. And it is doing him a great kindness to permit him to have an examination within the year.

Mr. PADGETT. Suppose the law said that a man who fails to pass an examination shall be hanged. Do you think that would be a reasonable law?

Mr. SISSON. I think that would be just about as reasonable a proposition as the one that you are advancing here now, in order to make it more easy for men to be promoted.

Mr. PADGETT. That is a matter for individual conception, and the gentleman is entitled to his own opinion.

Mr. BATHRICK. Are not these examinations very severe, technically?

Mr. PADGETT. Exceedingly so. There was one case called to my attention. I do not know the officer, but I have heard of the case. He passed in all his studies, but while he was on a boat, the boat ran aground. Now the mere fact that the boat ran aground was charged against his record and, although he was not held responsible for any fault or negligence, the mere fact that it had gone aground was charged against his record, and he was held back from promotion. There the punishment was entirely too severe.

Mr. SISSON. That is the fault of the regulations of the Navy Department and not the fault of the law necessarily.

Mr. PADGETT. The fault of the law is that it is 12 months' punishment instead of 6 months, and this proposes to adapt the punishment more nearly to the grade of the offense.

Mr. BATHRICK. The punishment at the present time, as I understand it, because of a failure to pass an examination, is as severe as if the party were convicted of an immoral act.

Mr. PADGETT. Three or four times more so.

Mr. SISSON. Is it not true that the Navy Department desires to keep up the personnel and discipline in the Navy?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. One of the principal objects of these regulations is to be sure to have proper discipline.

Mr. PADGETT. It is and it should be.

Mr. SISSON. Now you want to make the discipline very much less severe in order that these men may be promoted.

Mr. PADGETT. I want to make it less severe in this case; because of the changed conditions it has become entirely too severe.

Mr. SISSON. Why is it too severe now if it was not too severe in the past?

Mr. PADGETT. Simply because in the past, when we had classes of 15 or 20 graduating, if a man lost 10 or 15 points in promotion it was very different from a class now of 200, where he loses 200 points. In the first case, if he lost 10 points he would be set back in his promotion, say, 5 months, but now if he gets behind 200 points he is set back, say, 5 years. There is no trouble in understanding a proposition of that kind.

Mr. SISSON. How much will this increase the pay or the cost? How rapidly will it increase the promotion of officers?

Mr. PADGETT. It does not increase it at all.

Mr. SISSON. The man gets an opportunity to draw the increased salary that much earlier, does he not?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; but somebody else would have gone in ahead of him anyway. It is only a question whether you shall penalize him so as to set him back five years or whether he shall be set back two years or less.

Mr. SISSON. Are only a certain number promoted anyway every year?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. Is there a fixed number; fixed by law?

Mr. PADGETT. Above the grade of ensign; yes, sir.

Mr. SISSON. The number is fixed by law?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. So no more than a certain number can be promoted?

Mr. PADGETT. That is true.

Mr. SISSON. This, then, resolves itself into a question of who shall be promoted?

Mr. PADGETT. As to whether the officer shall be penalized and set back a certain time.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Whether he is set back six months or a year.

Mr. SISSON. I now understand the position of the chairman of the committee [Mr. PADGETT], which he did not make plain to me at first, that it does not increase the number of promotions. It simply changes—

Mr. PADGETT. It simply changes the penalty upon the individual.

Mr. SISSON. So it would not necessarily increase the expenditures under the present law and under the rules of the Navy?

Mr. PADGETT. None whatever. Mr. Speaker, I will reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that there may be some hardships under the present conditions, but after all the present conditions tend toward the promotion of the brightest men in the Navy, toward getting the brightest men at the top who are in command. If a man fails in a professional examination he is put back under the existing law. Of course, the effect of that in the end is that the men who pass the professional examination get to the top and become the men who are in command in time of peace, or, what is more important, in time of war.

This bill might properly be entitled "A bill to push to the front men who are not as well professionally qualified as their fellow officers." However, I would like to ask some gentleman familiar with the bill what will be its effect in some respects? Under the existing law the man who fails in his professional examination, where he takes the examination for promotion, does not receive the promotion at that time. At the end of 12 months he is entitled to receive a reexamination, and if he passes it is promoted in accordance with his reexamination.

Under this bill there is a conflict as to the time from which the promotion dates, or as to how the promotion affects the other officers—a conflict which, I think, gentlemen of the committee have not considered, or, at least, have not explained.

The bill first proposes to have a reexamination at the end of 6 months instead of 12 months; and if it stopped there it would provide a reexamination, and if the officer passed the examination he would receive promotion and number accordingly. Now, what will be the effect under the bill? Under this bill if the officer fails in his professional examination he is suspended from promotion for 6 months. At the end of 6 months he takes a reexamination, and if he passes the examination, where does he get his number?

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. He would take it as if he had passed at the end of 12 months.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Massachusetts says he gets it as he would if he passed at the end of 12 months.

Mr. PADGETT. The bill provides:

And shall suffer a loss of numbers equal to the average six months' rate of promotion to the grade for which said officer is undergoing examination during the five fiscal years next preceding the date of approval of said examination.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I know what the bill says. In other words, he displaces all of the numbers above him.

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. Certainly, that is absolutely the case; the numbers of men in the Navy are consecutive numbers. Here is a man that failed in his examination professionally; he is suspended from promotion for 6 months. During that 6 months other men are promoted and receive their numbers. Is not that the case, is not that the situation?

Mr. PADGETT. Those who stood the examination at the time he failed would take other numbers, and the next promotion in his grade would be the year following.

Mr. MANN. But they do receive other numbers?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; those that were examined at the time.

Mr. MANN. Those that passed the examination receive other numbers?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The report in this case says that 100 to 200 of them passed in 12 months.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Then 100 of them received numbers during 6 months' time.

Mr. PADGETT. The examination takes place—

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman answer; am I correct that 100 may receive promotion and numbers during the 6 months?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; they might receive it at the time the examination was taken.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's report says that in 12 months 100 to 200 may pass above him, so that in 6 months 100 may pass above him.

Mr. PADGETT. The examinations are annual, and during the period there might be none that would pass above him.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will be kind enough to try and get my idea, it may be that we can come to a conclusion.

I think the gentleman's bill is defective in this respect; but if the gentleman does not think so, very well. The man who is suspended now stays where he is, and meanwhile during the 6 months 100 officers may be examined, promoted, and receive numbers accordingly. But the gentleman's bill says that at the end of 6 months the officer who has failed may be examined, and if he passes the examination shall lose only in numbers the average for 6 months—"the average 6 months' rate of promotion." But here is a class that comes along and is examined. The class goes up and its members have their numbers, and when the officer who has been suspended passes his examination he is bound to take one of the numbers of the men who have been promoted ahead of him.

Mr. PADGETT. I think not.

Mr. MANN. There is no escape from it.

Mr. PADGETT. Let me make this statement to the gentleman. These examinations are annual. They are not held every two months or three months or six months.

Mr. MANN. I do not understand that they are held annually at all. They are held at different times.

Mr. PADGETT. For instance, a class graduates this year. Two years later they hold an examination for promotion to ensign. They have to serve the two years. At a certain period after that, after serving as ensign for three years, they are examined for promotion for lieutenant of the junior corps. After serving such a length of time, so many years, in that grade, they are examined for promotion to the grade of lieutenant. It is not every month or so that these examinations take place, but they are yearly. There are so many promotions a year. The Personnel Board provides that each year so many shall be retired. If not by death or by resignation, then there is what is called the plucking board, and they are taken out. Then there are so many promotions that go up, and these men stand their examinations for these promotions at these stated periods. With the loss of numbers of six months a man would lose in his class, but he would come in ahead of the other class that follows him a year later.

Mr. MANN. I am perfectly familiar with all that the gentleman has stated which is correct. A part of it is not correct. The gentleman refers to the plucking board, but the ones who are cut out of the service are not cut out at the end of the particular year. It is not all done at one time. Promotions come along in the course of a year. Nor are the examinations for promotions all held at one stated time in the year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to inquire of the gentleman if this be not the practice. There is a certain period in the year when the so-called plucking board is convened?

Mr. MANN. The plucking board acts only if enough officers have not been retired for other reasons. Under the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] all the nominations of the President for promotion in the Navy would be sent in at one time in the year, which we know is not the case.

Mr. PADGETT. The plucking board acts—

Mr. MANN. No; the gentleman stated that all the examinations were held at one time in the year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think this is the situation—that the experience of a number of years demonstrates that on an average a certain number of vacancies occur either by death or resignation or from some other cause during the first six months, and practically invariably the plucking board is required to exercise its functions at a definite period in the year.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is as familiar as I am with the facts. The plucking board really plucks very few birds. Most of them are given timely intimations under which they take retirements, and the promotions are made as the retirements occur. But that is not the point. I would like to get the opinion of the gentleman from New York on the proposition that I suggested, which apparently the gentleman from Tennessee does not understand. Under the existing law a man who is held back for a year when he passes his examination is promoted and takes a number at that time. He is not advanced in number over someone who has already been promoted. But under this bill a man is held back from promotion for six months, and if a large number have been promoted during that time, then he jumps over some of those in order to get his number.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Oh, no, no.

Mr. PRINCE. Yes, he does.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can say, "Oh, no, no," but it only shows that he has not thoroughly read the bill. It is absolutely the case that the two provisions in the bill are contradictory to that extent. If a man at the end of six months takes the examination on the basis of 40 promotions as the bill says—

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman offer an amendment covering that point?

Mr. MANN. No. Now I will appeal to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] on this. I tried to do so before, and I do not wish to take any of the time of the committee, but if the committee insists in doing something that will bring them into Congress in a short time for additional legislation that is their misfortune; we can not help it.

Mr. PADGETT. I will state to the gentleman, if he will permit, that this bill was prepared by the Judge Advocate of the Navy, who is supposed to be an expert in naval legislation. It was prepared with very great care; the matter has been investigated by the Senate committee; it was passed by the Senate and has been investigated by our committee; and we do not anticipate the troubles which the gentleman seems to anticipate.

Mr. MANN. I have heard those statements made before, and they do not have any effect. I have seen bills come back for reconstruction when prepared in the department.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the average number of promotions during six months prior to the five years would be 10, and during the six-months period it would be 15 promotions, then the gentleman's contention is that anybody suspended would necessarily take a number higher than 5 of those promoted.

Mr. MANN. Absolutely. Is there any escape from the contention? Here the gentleman himself says there may be 100 promotions in six months, and in his own report he says there may be 200 promotions in a year, but there can only be 40 during that time. If one of the 40 has been passed and then comes and takes examination for promotion and passes it, he must take the place of some one ahead of him and cut out a number. What is the effect of it? The gentleman in charge of the bill can not explain it, but it is certain that in the effort to accomplish something which in itself ought not to be done they will get the Naval Committee in a tangle which will cause legislation to put extra numbers on. They will be in here soon with bills saying this man should be carried as an extra number because he ought not to displace some one who has a number. Under the bill you have to displace men who have a number, and then they will come in and say we must carry these in extra numbers. It means in the end additional promotions and additional places and higher salaries.

Mr. Sisson. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. Sisson. In line with what the gentleman says the proviso in this bill making it retroactive in its effect so as to take effect January 1, 1911, will simply result in just exactly the condition which the gentleman from Illinois has illustrated.

Mr. MANN. Why, certainly.

Mr. Sisson. And these men who have failed since January, 1911, will be compelled to take the places of men who are in line with their class.

Mr. MANN. Of men who now have numbers.

Mr. Sisson. And it makes the bright man in this year's class responsible for the dullness of the one in last year's class.

Mr. MANN. Yes; that will be the case every time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAY). The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 17, noes 7.

So the bill was passed.

THE FINANCES.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a speech delivered by me before the State Bankers' Association of Vermont, at Montpelier, February 22, 1912.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a speech delivered by himself before the Bankers' Association of Vermont. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The following is the address above referred to:

ADDRESS OF HON. GEORGE W. PRINCE, OF ILLINOIS, BEFORE THE STATE BANKERS OF VERMONT AT MONTPELIER, FEBRUARY 22, 1912.

"Mr. Chairman and fellow countrymen, it is true, as the chairman stated, my father was born in this State. He and his elder brother, back in the early thirties, went to Peoria County, Ill., where later on he married and where I was born. This is my first visit to the State of his birth. Illinois is 400 miles in length from north to south. The north part of the State, in which I was born, is about on a line with Boston, Mass.; the southern part of the State is about on a line with Norfolk, Va. The State was peopled by those who went there from the then Eastern and Southern States. The south part of the State was peopled almost wholly by Virginians; the part of the State in which I live by New Englanders, including Vermonters. Coming to Illinois in those early days was that distinguished son of Vermont, the 'little giant'—Stephen A. Douglas [applause]—born up here in Brandon; coming from Kentucky his great political rival—Abraham Lincoln. [Applause.] Strange, it has always seemed to me, that this freedom-loving State, opposed so strongly to servile labor, should send one of its brightest, brainiest men to Illinois to advocate the cause of a party favoring servile labor, while Kentucky, a slave-holding State, should send one of its ablest and best men across from Indiana and over into Illinois to champion the cause of free labor. To my way of thinking, Lincoln and Douglas did more to save this Union than any other men that lived in their time who were not connected with the Civil War. [Applause.]

"But I am not here to retell that story with which you are all familiar, and I must address myself to the subject matter assigned to me to speak upon. As the speaker of the address of welcome said, you represent the enormous amount of $116,000,000—trustees of the wealth of the people of your State. You are a part of the great fraternity of business men of this country, and upon you devolves a tremendous responsibility as part of the banking fraternity of this great Republic. Now, I have no patience with people who abuse bankers. Who are they? The trusted men of your communities. Who are your stockholders? Your neighbors, your associates, your friends. Whose money do you have? Their money. If my wife should survive me—as I hope she may—and desired advice as to the right way to invest the funds which are to be her support for the rest of her life, I should expect her to go to the men in whom I had confidence in my lifetime—bankers. I know of no one to whom she could more properly turn for valuable advice than to the banker to aid her in caring for her money. You men are called upon to be the stewards of the peoples' savings, and faithfully and well do you perform the trust. The responsibility is great, quite as much so in the local country banker as in the banker of the great city; the latter has a larger responsibility, perhaps, more to do with, and greater deals to handle, but the proposition is just the same in its essential features, and both are of the same flesh and blood. Yet we live in an age when you are being discussed and criticized. As a member of the National Monetary Commission I heard such criticism made. When we left New York City on our western trip and asked different people what they thought of the tentative plan of Senator Aldrich, I remember hearing one sensible man in many ways, a man of influence and position, saying, 'I am against it.' And when asked, 'What is the matter with it?' replied, 'It bears the name of Aldrich and that is enough to condemn it.' Quite a number were opposed to the proposed plan for no other reason in the world than that Senator Aldrich had had to do with it.

"Now; that is a nonsensical, foolish position to take. Senator Aldrich is now out of public life; he is a private citizen; he has given his best thought and the best years of his life to the consideration of this subject. I believe it is now the one burning desire of that man's life to bring about a financial method that shall be of incalculable benefit to this country. I believe he has at heart only the interests of his fellow citizens; that his one great desire is to prepare a measure which will square with the best interests of all the people and of every class. My friends, there comes a time in the life of a man when he turns aside from politics and from the idea of money making, as he is approaching the Great Divide, and turns his thoughts and attention to doing the right thing and putting all else back of him. But this proposed measure is not wholly that of Senator Aldrich; it is the joint work of the members of the commission. As a tentative plan he presented it to the people to discuss, and invited discussion of it and suggestions of improvement, if anyone had such suggestions to make. The American Bankers' Association of this country met in convention approved and adopted it with suggestions of amendment. We had men of finance from all over the country before the commission; we had national-bank examiners to tell us how to prepare bank examinations. We desired to get all the light and all the information we could, to the end that the measure proposed might be the most perfect plan that could be presented. The result of our labors were put in the form of a proposed bill, entitled 'A bill to incorporate the National Reserve Association of the United States.' Now, that is the best we had to offer. I believe in trying to do something in this world; I believe in trying to accomplish something in this world. It is waste of time to do nothing but talk. Let us move along some lines. No one has suggested a better plan than this. Then why not put it to the test? Let us do something. It has been before the public since we made our unanimous report; it has been indorsed by that class of the public that are supposed to be, and should be, more familiar with the situation and the requirements than any other class of the community—the bankers. And it is the first time in my experience that we have seen the bankers of the country practically unanimous on any proposition.

"For many years I sat as a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency; measures would be before that committee, and the pulling and hauling, this way and that way, the wrangling and contentions about what they wanted and what they did not want, and what they ought to have or ought not to have, were so harassing that I thought if I did not get off of that committee I should end up in a madhouse. Finally we would say to those who appeared before the committee, 'Gentlemen, it is folly to bother us in this way; go back and see if you can find some proposition that you can agree upon and present it to us and we will take some action.' Now, as I say, as to this proposition embodied in the report of the commission, it has got to a point where the bankers and business men of the country are agreed, and they favor the proposed plan, in the main. The theorist favors it, the publicist favors it, the professors in the schools favor it. The only people we found who did not favor it were people in the extreme West, who had other ideas. What were some of the objections made to it? One man says, 'Here, I don't like the idea of having the Government delegate its power of issuing money to banks.' 'Well,' we ask, 'what do you propose?' He says, 'I believe the Government should issue all the money to meet all its obligations.' We ask, 'Where would that lead us to?' 'It don't make any difference where it leads, but issue the money—issue it like the leaves of the forest.' Would you have us do that? No. Some would favor the opening of the mints and having unlimited coinage of gold and silver. We ask them, 'Do you think that is the way to do?' 'Yes,' they say, 'and thousands of people think that way.' Those are the men we have had to deal with.

"Now, gentlemen, the question of improving the currency is a practical legislative question. We have got to get down to brass tacks, and we look to you men for help. So, I would rather speak along that line than 'carry coals to Newcastle' in a scuttle. You men understand this business better than I do; you know your troubles; we have suggested what we think is a good plan to afford relief in those troubles. We think it is better for banks to be a system of banks, organized and coordinated together for purposes of power. In unity is strength. Suppose in the revolutionary period Vermont had said, 'We will take care of Vermont—we will not send our troops away from here,' and other States or Colonies had done the same, what would have been the result? Not victory, but defeat.

"Suppose, to bring it to a concrete point—suppose we should have trouble with our neighbor on the north—which we never shall have—but suppose we should have and 200,000 redcoats are landed of the best soldiery in the world, and the President calls for troops. Vermont says, 'We can provide so many thousand.' New York says, 'We will furnish so many thousand.' But suppose Vermont says, 'We will keep our troops to protect our own border,' and New York says the same; we should have a number of small forces to be met and conquered in turn, succumbing to superior force. On the other hand, let us suppose a large army made up of the several State contingents—an army equal in quality and quantity to the invaders. What would be the result? The invaders would be hurled back over the border, shattered and defeated. Our banks are in that same condition. Trouble comes and men want money. What do you do? You try to get that money as quickly as you can and pay your depositors who call for their money, and you do it at the expense of every bank in the neighborhood or anywhere else you can get it. You seek to protect yourselves, and in so doing you weaken all the rest. Now, suppose you have a national reserve piled up? Under the provisions of this proposed bill you can get your paper discounted at once and get cash or credit to pay to the people who call for their money. Could you not at once avert a threatened panic? Would you not be a solid phalanx, and, in addition to that, would there not be a general system of banking in this country? Who is it you are afraid of? Not yourselves. It is the weak bank—it is the bank not properly conducted—that fails, and then the people can not distinguish one from another. The rush comes for the money; the weak bank succumbs and precipitates trouble upon all the banks throughout the length and breadth of the land. In other words, no chain is stronger than its weakest link, and the weakest link in the chain of banks is the one that breaks first. But if you are coordinated together and the banking system is the same and conducting business in the same way, how much safer and better it will be for the entire country. I asked my friend Farrigden his idea of the way I should discuss this question. 'Well,' he said, 'Mr. PRINCE, there is one point in particular the people seem to be afraid of.' I said, 'Well, that is the one I want to discuss.' He said, 'They are afraid the interests of Wall Street or some other financial power will control this system of banks and control the money centers and the money power of the country.'
